Think what unconscious culture, what refining influence, the people of a city might breathe in with the common breath of life from concerts in the open air, from military bands, and, better still, from civic bands, if only our king and lord, the People aforesaid, in its corporate capacity, would make enlightened provision for these things, and institute a competent commission, or commissioner, a "Philistrate, master of the revels," of real taste and judgment, to see to it that the bands be good ones, the programmes of a kind to elevate and civilize, and not demoralize by brutal bray of everlasting brass; and that the repertoire be made up of models of enduring beauty, instead of specimens of every foolish reigning fashion in its turn. Such an office should be of high honor, of careful appointment, and safe tenure, like a judgeship.

Think what revival of the best enthusiasm, what enriching of the inner man's resources, what a lift to thought and feeling, may be given, has been given, by great festivals of music, and even "great jubilees," could their ambition be a little sobered, and all the claptrap and extravagance left out.

Think, above all, how much of the best kind of culture, though it be undefinable, undemonstrative, a silent absorption, as it were, through all the pores and into every finest spiritual fibre, may be found in the stated series of concerts of the highest order, where to listen well is to take part, and where every person present both in body and in soul "assists," in the French sense of the word. All that is necessary to this is, that, besides rich material, there shall be a pure artistic spirit pervading the whole concert; the programme ought to be an art-work in itself, with nothing miscellaneous about it, it being not enough that it should contain fine things; it should contain them so placed that they shall not jostle one another, each obliterating the impression of the last; and that their spell shall not be broken by bringing them into incongruous company with things of so irreconcilable a spirit that one can carry home no clear impression of the concert as a whole.

But of the good influence of music in the more popular and public way the half is not told, so long as we have not hinted how much fitly chosen music may do, has done, though too seldom, as an element in public celebrations of great events in human progress, in commemorations of great men, or in aid of noble charities. On such occasions its chief efficacy depends upon significant, appropriate selections to be played or sung; upon the close affinity or correspondence of each strain of music, both with the spirit of the hour and with whatever spoken thought or ceremony it may prepare or follow; in a word, upon a certain artistic unity of programme, of which it catches by quick sympathy the key-note, dictates in some way the order, moulds all into symmetry, tenderly guards throughout the unbroken continuity of meaning, and serves as frame and background to the whole. She, Music, should be called in at the first inchoation of the plot as the most sympathetic, subtly appreciative, suggestive confidante; and when it comes to the fulfilment, her's is the part of chief interpreter, as well as of disposer of all minds to the right mood of expectation and the right impression after. Commonly we do quite differently. We call in music upon such occasions, not as an equal, a co-working intelligence, but rather as king's jester, to supply a little idle recreation in the pauses. We employ a band of instruments, mostly military, to discourse loud polkas, pot-pourries from operas, or what not, selected without rhyme or reason, and so rudely break the spell and rob the hour of character and meaning. Art would reform this. Art knows nothing miscellaneous.

We are not quite without examples of the better way; our Boston Music Hall, within a few years, has been witness of a few which might be followed. Who that was present will forget that welcome to our noble Lincoln's Proclamation of Emancipation on that first of January, when Emerson first read his thrilling "Boston Hymn" of liberty and justice; and when music, furnishing first the darker prelude, in allusion to the days of bondage and of hope deferred, through the Overture to "Egmont" and that exciting number from "The Hymn of Praise," in which to the anxiously repeated question, "Will the night soon pass?" the clear soprano, like a stream of sunshine, startles with the cry, "The night is departing!" and the glorious crescendo of the chorus floods the world with light and carries all before it in a blaze of high-pitched harmony and trumpets,—then proceeded in the lofty vein of heroism and of holy triumph, by making heard, in such significant connection (not to name all), the glorious Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; the chorus from "Elijah," full of comfort to the long-suffering, "He watching over Israel"; Handel's sublime Hallelujah; and finally the patriotic "sun-burst" of the Overture to "William Tell"?

Think, too, of the part that music bore the day we listened to the eulogy of our good Governor. How the organ whispered peace in those sweet strains of the concluding chorus, sung at the tomb of the Saviour, of Bach's Passion Music; and how the mournful effect of that grandest expression of a people's grief, bereft of a true hero, the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, was tempered by the chorus, full of comfort, from "St. Paul," "Happy and blest are they who have endured"; then by the heavenly andante, reassuring and uplifting, from the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; and then, to sum up all in one grand lesson, the strong, confiding choral, harmonized by Bach, "What God does, surely is well done!"

Think, too, how music lent new meaning and new beauty to that commemoration of a great man of science, when our Agassiz paid noble tribute to the life and labors of his great friend and teacher, Humboldt; how the music and the spoken word shed light upon each other; how Mozart's chorus of the Priests of Isis sang of the consecration of the noble youth to Truth, wherever she might lead him; and how the wondrous Overture to "The Magic Flute," and the first movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, by their fascinating hint of the perpetual pursuit of unity through all the labyrinthine windings of variety, fitly prepared and followed a discourse of which that was the very theme!

Now out of all these ways of popular exposure to the influence of good music, as well as from private, even solitary communion with its master spirit, comes much valuable culture; not in the sense of musical or any other knowledge, technical and special; not a direct conscious culture, as such, of the memory or of the reasoning faculties; not scholarship, perhaps, nor ease and elegance of manners nor address; not force of will or quickness of decision; but, nevertheless, a culture moulding us insensibly, a sort of atmospheric culture, weighing gently upon each and all, like wholesome air, expanding the chest, warming the heart, putting the nerves in tune, disposing to unconscious courtesy and kindness, prompting each to fill his place cheerfully and unobtrusively, forgetting self in the harmonious whole, weaving a sympathetic bond, making us all feel like happy, trustful children, free and not afraid.

We may learn something from our German fellow-citizens in illustration of this important chapter in the art of life. We as a people seem somehow to have lacked this art. We court prosperity like anxious bond-slaves, fearing to call a moment of our lives our own, fearing to live, in our unceasing, feverish pursuit of the mere means of living. We are enterprising to a fault; we go ahead faster than others; but it is by a centaur-like contrivance, letting a large part of our real vital, human self run down into the lower animal, or the machine that carries us. Why, O "live Yankee," O proud Westener, why waste your life in rivaling a steam-engine? Man makes himself a mere machine for generating or accumulating power, and all for what? And with what a solemn, sanctimonious, lean, hard-favored way he does it often! With what a quasi-religious and self-righteous tone he quotes his business maxims! How he amalgamates unworldly orthodoxy with the most secular showman's cant in the advertising of his wares! How he practically confounds religion with his own self-love, as generalized into prudential maxims!

We esteem ourselves the freest people on this planet; yet we have perhaps as little real freedom as any other; for we are the slaves of our own feverish enterprise, and of a barren theory of discipline, which would fain make us virtuous to a fault through abstinence from very life. We are afraid to give ourselves up to the free and happy instincts of our nature. All that is not pursuit of advancement in some good, conventional, approved way of business or politics, or fashion, or intellectual reputation, or professed religion, we count waste. We lack geniality; nor do we, as a people, understand the meaning of the word. We ought to learn it practically of our Germans. It comes of the same root with the word genius. Genius is the spontaneous principle; it is free and happy in its work; it is artist and not drudge; its whole activity is reconciliation of the heartiest pleasure with the purest loyalty to conscience, with the most holy, universal, and disinterested ends. Genius, as Beethoven gloriously illustrates in his Choral Symphony (indeed, in all his symphonies), finds the key-note and solution of the problem of the highest state in "JOY," taking his text from Schiller's Hymn. Now all may not be geniuses, in the sense that we call Shakespeare, Mozart, Raphael, men of genius. But all should be part-takers of this spontaneous, free, and happy method of genius; all should live childlike, genial lives, and not wear all the time the consequential livery of their unrelaxing business, nor the badge of party and profession in every line and feature of their faces.

This genial, childlike faculty of social enjoyment, this happy art of life, is just what our countrymen may learn from the social "Liedertafel" and the summer singing-festivals of which the Germans are so fond. There is no element of national character which we so much need; and there is no class of citizens whom we should be more glad to adopt and own than those who set us such examples. So far as it is a matter of culture, it is through Art chiefly that the desiderated genial era must be ushered in. The Germans have the sentiment of art, the feeling of the beautiful in art, and consequently in nature, more developed than we have. Above all, music offers itself as the most available, most popular, most influential of the fine arts,—music, which is the art and language of the feelings, the sentiments, the spiritual instincts of the soul, and so becomes a universal language, tending to unite and blend and harmonize all who may come within its sphere.

2. Such civilizing, educating power has music for society at large. Now in the finer sense of culture, such as we look for in more private and select "society," as it is called, music in the salon, in the small chamber concert, where congenial spirits are assembled in its name,—good music, of course,—does it not create a finer sphere of social sympathy and courtesy? does it not better mould the tone and manners from within than any imitative "fashion" from without? What society, upon the whole, is quite so sweet, so satisfactory, so refined, as the best musical society, if only Mozart, Mendelssohn, Franz, Chopin, set the tone! The finer the kind of music heard or made together, the better the society. This bond of union only reaches the few; coarser, meaner, more prosaic natures are not drawn to it. Wealth and fashion may not dictate who shall be of it. Here congenial spirits meet in a way at once free, happy and instructive, meet with an object which insures "society"; whereas so-called society, as such, is often aimless, vague, unedifying and fatiguing, for the want of any subject-matter. Here one gets ideas of beauty which are not mere arbitrary fashions, ugly often to the eye of taste. Here you may escape vulgarity by a way not vulgar in itself, like that of fashion, which makes wealth and family and means of dress its passports. Here you can be as exclusive as you please, by the soul's right, not wronging any one; here learn gentle manners, and the quiet ease and courtesy with which cultivated people move, without in the same process learning insincerity.

Of course the same remarks apply to similar sincere reunions in the name of any other art, or poetry. But music is the most social of them all, even if each listener find nothing set down to his part (or even hers!) but tacet.

3. We have fancied ourselves entering a musical house together, but we must leave it with no time to make report, or picture out the scene. Now could we only enter the chamber, the inner sanctum, the private inner life of a thoroughly musical person, one who is wont to live in music! Could we know him in his solitude! (You can only know him in yourself, unless he be a poet and creator in his art and bequeath himself in that form, in his works, for any who know how to read.)

If the best of all society is musical society, we go further and say: The sweetest of all solitude is when one is alone with music. One gets the best of music, the sincerest part, when he is alone. Our poet-philosopher has told us to secure solitude at any cost; there is nothing which we can so ill afford to do without. It is a great vice of our society, that it provides for and disposes to so little solitude, ignoring the fact that often there is more loneliness in company than out of it. Now to a musical person, in the mood of it, in the sweet hours by himself, comes music as the nearest friend, nearer and dearer than ever before, and he soon finds that he never was in such good company. I doubt if symphony of Beethoven, opera of Mozart, Passion Music of Bach, was ever so enjoyed or felt in grandest public rendering, as one may feel it while he recalls its outline by himself at his piano (even if he be a slow and bungling reader, and must get it out by piecemeal). I doubt if such an one can carry home from the performance, in presence of the applauding crowd, nearly so much as he may take to it from such inward, private preparation.

Are you alone? what spirits you can summon up to fill the vacancy, and people it with life and love and beauty! Take down the volume of Sonatas, the arrangement of the great Symphony, the recorded reveries of Chopin, the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, or even the chorals, with the harmony of Bach, in which the four parts blend their several individual melodies together in such loving service of the whole, that the plain people's tune becomes a germ unfolding into endless wealth and beauty of meaning, and you have the very essence of all prayer and praise and gratitude, as if you were a worshipper in the ideal church. Nothing like music, then, to banish the benumbing ghost of ennui. It lends secret sympathy, relief, expression, to all one's moods, loves, longings, sorrows; comes nearer to the soul, or to the secret wound, than any friend or healing sunshine from without. It nourishes and feeds the hidden springs of hope and love and faith; renews the old conviction of life's spring-time,—that the world is ruled by love, that God is good, that beauty is a divine end of life, and not a snare and an illusion. It floods out of sight the unsightly, muddy grounds of life's petty, anxious, doubting moments, and makes immortality a present fact, lived in and realized. It locks the door against the outer world of discords, contradictions, importunities, beneath the notice of a soul so richly occupied; lets "Fate knock at the door" (as Beethoven said in explanation of his symphony),—Fate and the "pursuing Furies,"—and even welcomes them, and turns them into gracious goddesses, Eumenides!

Music in this way is a marvellous elixir to keep off old age. Youth returns in solitary hours with Beethoven and Mozart. Touching the chords of the Moonlight Sonata, the old man is once more a lover; with the andante of the Pastoral Symphony, he loiters by the shady brookside hand in hand with his fresh heart's first angel. You are past the sentimental age, yet you can weep alone in music,—not weep exactly, but find outlet more expressive and more worthy of your manly faith.

A great grief comes, an inconsolable bereavement, an humiliating, paralyzing reverse, a blow of Fate giving the lie to your best plans and bringing your best powers into discredit with yourself; then you are best prepared and best entitled to receive the secret visitations of these tuneful goddesses and muses.

"Who devers ate his bread in tears,
He knows you not, ye heavenly powers."

So sings the German poet. It is the want of inward, deep experience, it is innocence of sorrow and of trial, more than the lack of any special cultivation of musical taste or knowledge, that debars many people—naturally most young people, and all who are what we call shallow natures—from the feeling and enjoyment of many of the truest, deepest, and most heavenly of all the works of music. Take the Passion Music of Bach, for instance; if you can sit down alone at your piano and decipher strains and pieces of it when you need such music, you shall find that in its quiet quaintness, its sincerity and tenderness, its abstinence from all striving for effect, it speaks to you and entwines itself about your heart, like the sweetest, deepest verses in the Bible, when "the soul muses till the fire burns."

Such a panacea is this art for loneliness. But sometimes, too, it may intensify the sense of loneliness, only for more heavenly relief at last. Think of the deep composer, of lonely, sad Beethoven, wreaking his pain upon expression in those impatient chords and modulations, putting his sorrows into sonatas, and wringing triumph always out of all! Look at him as he was then, morose, they say, and lonely and tormented; look where he is now, as the whole world knows him, feels him, seeks him for its joy and inspiration,—and who can doubt of immortality?

Now in such private solace, in such solitary joys, is there not culture? Can one rise from such communings with the good spirits of the tone-world, and go out, without new peace, new faith, new hope, and good-will in his soul? He goes forth in the spirit of reconciliation and of patience, however much he may hate the wrong he sees about him, or however little he accept authorities and creeds that make war on his freedom. The man who has tasted such life, and courted it till he has become acclimated in it, whether he be of this party or that, or none at all, whether he be believer or "heretic," conservative or radical, follower of Christ by name or "Free Religionist," belongs to the harmonic and anointed body-guard of peace, fraternity, good-will; his instincts all have caught the rhythm of that holy march; the good genius leads, he has but to follow cheerfully and humbly. For somehow the minute fibres, the infinitesimal atoms of his being, have got magnetized, as it were, into a loyal, positive direction toward the polar-star of unity; he has grown attuned to a believing, loving mood, just as the body of a violin, the walls of a music-hall, by much music-making, become gradually seasoned into smooth vibration.

The Hereford Festival.

[From the Choir, Aug. 27 and Sep. 3.]

THE Festival of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, was commenced on Tuesday morning at the cathedral, with a service at which Dr. Jebb, the well known author of the treatise on "The Choral Service," was the preacher. The Doctor seemed to feel the difficulties of his position as the apologist for a system, with the details of which he could not in all respects express his concurrence; and it is not too much to say that, while his sermon gave satisfaction to many among the congregation, it was felt by the upholders of the present régime to be scarcely what they wanted, or what they have been accustomed to on these occasions. The length of the service made the hour for the commencement of the first oratorio slightly late, but the beautiful music of Eljah was never more successfully rendered. The audience, owing to the change in the weather, was somewhat smaller than had been expected, but the artists, including those incomparable exponents of the two chief characters, Mdlle. Titiens and Mr. Santley, exerted themselves to the utmost, and were well supported by the choir. The band, consisting of the best London performers, was, it is needless to add, perfectly at home in the accompaniments. In the evening, in the place of the usual miscellaneous and secular concert in the Shire Hall, there was a second performance of sacred music within the cathedral, which was lighted, albeit rather dimly, for the occasion. The departure from established precedent—this being the first time in the history of the celebrated gatherings that an evening performance has been given within the church—was amply justified by the result, as there can be no comparison between the enjoyment to be derived from listening under the most favorable circumstances to two complete works as compared with the average concert, consisting of little more than a repetition of the most famous show pieces in which the respective artists have gained their laurels during the season. We can easily imagine that to some of the country members of the audience the change may not have been altogether satisfactory; but to those already initiated with the ordinary programmes of St. James's Hall, the visit to the old cathedral town was rendered doubly pleasant by the change, the credit for which is, we believe, due to Mr. Townshend Smith, the accomplished local organist. The music chosen for the occasion consisted of Haydn's Creation, of which, however, the third part was omitted, and Mr. Barnby's Rehearsal, the sacred idyll which met with such unmistakable favor when performed for the first time under the composer's direction at his Oratorio Concerts. Here, as in London, he took the baton, and must have felt amply satisfied by the admirable manner in which his work was performed. With Mdlle. Titiens as the heroine, and Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas to complete the trio, the solo parts were secure, and the local choir did ample justice to the choruses. While there is much that is elaborate, and evidences the pen of the skilled and thoughtful musician in every bar, there is also much of that tasteful writing which has won for Mr. Barnby's anthems and part songs such a high rank among modern choral compositions, and no one who has watched his career can fail to see that he has a bright future before him. Of the performances of the oratorio which preceded the "Idyll," we need say nothing more than that in the second part Mdlle. Titiens, who had sung most magnificently the air "With Verdure Clad," was replaced by Mdlle. Sinico, and that Mr. Montem Smith was the tenor.

On Wednesday morning at the Cathedral the only fault in the programme was its length, consisting as it did of three complete works, Sullivan's Prodigal Son, Spohr's Die Letzen Dinge, and Mozart's Mass No. 12. The Royal visitors, the Prince and Princess Christian, arrived during the morning, but missed what may almost be regarded as the most attractive item, at any rate from the provincial point of view—the Prodigal Son. All three works received ample justice, and the chief singers were the same as before, Mdlle. Patey taking the contralto music. In the evening there was the first of the miscellaneous concerts in the Shire Hall, with some good work for the orchestra, including Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. Mr. Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, and selections from the Lorelei of Mendelssohn and Beethoven's Ruins of Athens.

The music on Thursday morning at the Cathedral was chiefly composed of Mendelssohn's works, including his "Reformation" symphony, the unfinished Oratorio "Christus," and the forty-second Psalm, to which followed, rather unhappily for the composer, a short cantata by Mr. Henry Holmes, the words by Dr. Watts. The introduction of the Symphony may be said to have marked an era in the history of these gatherings almost as conspicuously as the occurrence of the first evening performance within the cathedral walls. As to the propriety of the step thus taken, opinions were naturally diverse, for although on the principle that "all's well that ends well," the choice of the work may be justified from the fact that it closes with the famous chorale, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," and that its coloring generally is of a sacred character, it cannot be forgotten that the "Allegro" is completely the reverse, and is suggestive of totally opposite associations, beautiful as it is from an artistic point of view. Leaving this question however, the hearing of the Symphony was unquestionably a welcome addition to the programme, although its execution was not altogether satisfactory, and could not be compared with its performance by Mr. Manns' band at the Crystal Palace, where it was first introduced to the English public. The fragment from "Christus" was still more interesting, and on the whole better performed, the choruses especially being sung with considerable vigor. The forty-second psalm, "As pants the hart," was fairly but roughly done, Mdlle. Titiens singing the air, "For my soul thirsteth for God," in which Mr. Crozier played the oboe obligato with admirable taste. Of Mr. Holmes' cantata, it may be said that although far from striking, it is a conscientious work, and shows traces of the pen of the educated musician throughout. The comparative absence of difficulties in the score made it easy work for hand and choir, and the solos by Mrs. Edith Wynne were admirably rendered. A selection from Handel's Oratorio concluded the somewhat lengthy programme. Of the evening concert we need say nothing more than that the leading vocalists took part in it, and that the orchestra, under Mr. Townshend Smith's bat, played the overtures to Oberon and Semiramide. The usual finale, the Messiah, was given on Friday morning to the largest audience assembled during the week, and the ball in the evening, which failed to attract the usual number of visitors, formed the actual conclusion of the proceedings. Although not really a part of the festival proper, the chamber concert at the College Hall deserves a word of notice, more especially from the fact that the programme included a Quartet (in F, No. 10) from the pen of Mr. Ellerton, whose works have been frequently noticed in our columns. Spohr's Sextet in C Major, and Mendelssohn's Overture, with some vocal music by Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Montem Smith, completed the scheme. As a whole, the festival can scarcely be said to have been a marked success. The only novelty was a comparatively insignificant one, and financially the results were much below those of the previous meeting.

The Birmingham Festival.

(From the Orchestra, Sept. 2.)

Birmingham this week has shown a livelier front than did Hereford last week. As is the great manufacturing city in point of vitality to the quiet precincts of Gloucester or Worcester, so is the Birmingham Festival in point of importance to the Festival of the Three Choirs. The Birmingham gathering has a history indissoluble from the history of musical production. "Eljah" and "St. Paul" recall Birmingham; "Eli" and "Naaman" belong to its later births; and this year Benedict and Hiller and Barnett are glad to follow in the ways trodden by Mendelssohn and Costa. Birmingham is likewise proud, as becomes a commercial community, of the financial success of its festival. Some ninety thousand pounds have been raised through this agency for the General Hospital, which takes the profits of the meetings; and the triennaries show a satisfactory progress of profits. Thus 1867 was better than 1864, and it is expected that 1870 will beat 1867. Exactly the reverse process has been taking place at Hereford.

The festival this year has taken place under the patronage of the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Duke of Cambridge. The Earl of Bradford is president. The principal lady singers were Mdlle. Titiens, Madame Lommens-Sherrington, Mdlle. Ilma de Murska, Madame Patey, Miss Edith Wynne, and Mdlle. Draxill. As tenors Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Cummings; as basses, Mr. Santley and Signor Foli made up the vocal staff. Madame Arnabella Goddard was engaged as the pianist; M. Sainton as solo violinist. Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ. The chorus consisted of about four hundred voices, selected from the Birmingham Ancient Harmonic Association, the Birmingham Festival Choir, with a contingent from the other societies. The chorus masters were Mr. W. C. Stockley and Mr. A. J. Sutton. The army of executants, with Sir Michael Costa as chef d'orchestre, numbered thirty first violins, with M. Sainton as principal; seventeen violoncellos, with Mr. A. Howell as principal; seventeen double basses, with Mr. Howell as principal. The wind instruments, which were doubled throughout the orchestra, had as chiefs Mr. Radcliffe, flute; Mr. Barret, oboe; Mr. Lazarus, clarinet; Mr. Hutchings, bassoon; Mr. C. Harper, horn; Mr. T. Harpor, trumpet; Mr. Hawkes, trombone; Mr. Hughes, ophicleide; Mr. Horton, double drums; Mr. Pheasant, side drums. Messrs. Horton and Peck were the librarians.

The Festival proper opened on Tuesday with "Eljah." It is befitting that Birmingham should thus honor the memory of Mendelssohn, for Mendelssohn in his life honored Birmingham. In 1837, after "St. Paul," he wrote: "I cannot at this time attempt to describe the Birmingham Musical Festival; it would require many sheets to do so, and whole evenings when we are once more together, even cursorily to mention all the remarkable things crowded into those days. One thing, however, I must tell you, because I know it will give you pleasure, which is that I never had such brilliant success, and can never have any more unequivocal than at this Festival." Three years after this, Mendelssohn produced at the festival his "Lobgesung." The next meeting lapsed without a production, but he was then engaged with the "Elijah," brought out a year before his death, which unhappily cut short the glorious results projected for the future.

The performance of "Elijah" on Tuesday leaves nothing to criticize beyond saying that the solos in the first part were taken by Mdme. Sherrington, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley, assisted by Mrs. Sutton, Mdle. Drasdil, Mr. R. Mason, Mr. Briggs, and Mr. Smythson; that in the second part, Mdle. Tietjens replaced Mdme. Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves Mr. Rigby, and Mdle. Drasdil took the principal contralto's place; and that the choral effects were exceedingly finely rendered. With Sir Michael Costa as conductor the issue could hardly be otherwise. There was no applause, the rule of the Festival being against such demonstration; and the President did not exercise his prerogative. The attendance numbered 2227; the receipts amounted to nearly £3000.

Mr. J.F. Barnett's Cantata "Paradise and the Peri," was performed on Tuesday night, under the composer's own direction, and to an audience numbering above 2000 persons. When shortly after the clock struck eight, Mr. Barnett entered the orchestra, the greeting was of the most enthusiastic kind, and was ample justification for the Committee in having solicited him to produce an original work for the Festival.

Mr. Barnett, having made a success in the "Ancient Mariner," was emboldened to attack the poem of Moore,—an equally fanciful work with that of Coleridge, but wanting in the strong dramatic situations and powerful contrasts with which the "Ancient Mariner" abounds. It is possible that in his first subject, Mr. Barnett found an embarras de richesses; while in the latter he had to make the most of the material provided. The two works are thus nearer on a level than would be thought probable by those who knew both poems, and their capability of musical treatment. But in truth, Mr. Barnett has in neither case set the Poem to music; he has simply taken the title and arranged the words as he thought fit, without any regard to the plan of the original author. The chief characteristics of "Paradise and the Peri," are melody and pleasing orchestration; the melody possibly as original as can be expected; the use made of the orchestra being in every sense popular. The composer rarely attempts grandeur of effect; never seems to care to expend the resources at command of even ordinary composers. In a word, he does not appear to have had the wish to produce a lasting work at the cost of labor, but has depended on attaining a success by appealing to the ears of the general public rather than the verdict of critical musicians. Having stated thus much of the work as a whole, we must affirm in justice to Mr. Barnett, that what he has done, he has done well; that his melodies—(the name of Barnett is a guarantee for them)—are most lovely and expressive; and that he has shown good taste, and a perfect knowledge of the delicate nuances to be produced in the employment of the orchestra to color his themes.

The performance was generally good, the four principal singers, Mdle. Tietjens, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Rigby, and Signor Foli, leaving nothing to desire. The pieces encored were a tenor solo, "Oh, if there be in this earthly sphere," Signor Foli's "Blest tears," and an unaccompanied quartet, "She wept, the air grew pure." Mdle. Tietjens was excellent in "Though sunny the lake," and "But whither shall the spirit;" as was Mdme. Patey in "Sweet was the angel." Mr. Rigby's song above noticed will probably be a rage in the next concert season. The choruses offered no difficulties, and were well executed. The composer was greatly applauded on the conclusion of the Cantata. We believe that it will be frequently heard at the meetings of our various choral societies, and that the solos will be in great demand singly in our drawing-rooms. Had the work aimed higher, it is possible that these results would have been missed; and here is some if not sufficient excuse for Mr. Barnett not having drawn on his undoubted resources to the full extent.

The second part of the concert consisted of a miscellaneous collection of music executed in the following order:—

Overture ("Freischütz")	.....	Weber.
Song, Mdle. Drasdil, "Sleep, dearest, Sleep"	.....	Randegger.
"Carnival de Venice," Mdle. Ilma de Murska	.....	Benedict.
Trio, Mdme. L. Sherrington, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, "Dunque il mio ben" ("Flauto Magico")	.....	Mozart.

Song, Miss E. Wynne, "Bid me discourse"	.....	Sir H. Bishop.
Concerto, pianoforte, in G minor, Mdme. Arabella Goddard	.....	Mendelssohn.
Air, Sims Reeves, "The snow lies white"	.....	A. S. Sullivan.
Song, Mdme. L. Sherrington (organ obbligato)	.....	{Chevalier.
	.....	{Lemmons.
Trio, Miss E. Wynne, Mdle. Drasdil, and Mr. Sims Reeves, "Qui vi son fonte prati"	.....	Sir M. Costa.
Airs, Mdme. Ilma de Murska (Hungarian National Airs) (Flauto Obbligato, Mr. Riddell)	.....
Air, Mr. W. H. Cummings, "Ah non credevi" (Mignon)	.....	A. Thomas.
Duo, Mdme. L. Sherrington, and Signor Foli, a La dove prende ("Flauto Magico")	.....	Mozart.
Quintet, Mdle. Ilma de Murska, Mdle. Drasdil, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli, "Chi mi frena" (Lucia)	.....	Donizetti.
Overture ("Zampa")	.....	Herold.

The above calls for little remark, as the execution of the various pieces by the artists to whom they were allotted is generally well known. We must, however, say a word for Mdme. Goddard's magnificent performance of the G minor concerto, than which nothing could possibly be finer. Sir M. Costa conducted. The total receipts for this concert amounted to £1526.

The oratorio selected for performance on Wednesday was "Naaman," Sir Michael Costa's second work of the kind, composed for the Festival of 1864. Besides forming the resistance piece at Birmingham Festivals, "Naaman" has been performed at Exeter Hall sufficiently often to familiarize all musicians with its general features. The dramatic skill and contrapuntal workmanship which successively illustrate the translation of "Elijah," the miracle of the cruse of oil, the miracle of the Shunamite's son, the healing of Naaman's leprosy, have received full confirmation; and a Birmingham Festival would be held incomplete without Costa's work. The principal singers this time were Mesdames Sherrington and Patey, Mdle. Drasdil, Miss Edith Wynne, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Cummings and Santley; the respective efforts of whom were wholly satisfactory. The numbers for which, by the privilege vested in the President, encores were awarded were the trio "Haste to Samaria," excellently sung by Mdle. Drasdil, Miss Wynne, and Mr. Sims Reeves; the chorus, "God who cannot be unjust," a composition full of soft sentiment, beautifully given by the choir; and the well known quartet "Honor and glory." Mr. Sims Reeves sang splendidly; his delivery of Naaman's heart-sick desire for death as a release from the leprosy, "Oh that I might die," was unexampled. Mdme. Patey also excelled herself in the Shunamite boy's air "I dreamt I was in heaven," and Miss Edith Wynne as the Israelitish maiden Adah was uniformly successful. The receipts of this performance amounted to £918.

The programme of the miscellaneous concert on Wednesday evening was as follows:—

PART I.
Cantata, Ode to Shakespeare, Prof. P. Stewart,
Duo, Miss E. Wynne, and Mr. Rigby,
"Tornami a dir," Don Pasquale	.....	Donizetti.
Aria, Mdle. Ilma de Murska, "O Luce di quest'anima"	.....	Donizetti.
Duo, Mdle. Tietjens and Mdme. Patey, "Ebben per mia memoria" ("Gazza Ladra")	.....	Hosini.
Overture, "Overture di Ballo" (composed expressly for the Festival)	.....	A.S. Sullivan.

A selection from Beethoven's works:—Overture ("Fugmont"); Quartet, Mdme. Sherrington, Mdle. Tietjens, Mr. Cummings, and Signor Foli, "Il corte la mia fe" ("Fidelio"); Song, Mdle. Ilma de Murska, "Ah perfido"; Concerto, pianoforte (in E flat), Mdme. Arabella Goddard; Song, Mdle. Tietjens, "Qual furor" ("Fidelio"); Trio, Mdme. Sherrington, Mr. Rigby, and Signor Foli, "Fuga grata al oio" ("Fidelio"); Song, Mr. Sims Reeves, "Adelaide" (with pianoforte accompaniment by Mdme. Arabella Goddard); Trio, Mdme. Sherrington, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, "Tremate empl tremate"; Air, Mdle. Drasdil, "In questa tomba oscura"; Finale, Mdle. Tietjens, Mdme. Sherrington, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, Mr. Smythson, and Chorus ("Fidelio").

Whatever merit Dr. Stewart's music possesses, it cannot have been inspired by Mr. Toole's verses. The setting is musically; and the Doctor displays a thorough knowledge of instrumentation and vocal writing. But there is an absence of interest, and notwithstanding the capital singing of Mdme. Sherrington and Mr. Rigby, it fell flat. It was a forlorn hope to operate on such words, but as the music is really good, quite apart from the verse, we would suggest a change of libretto, when Dr. Stewart's efforts may stand a chance of being appreciated. Dr. Stewart was warmly applauded on entering and leaving the orchestra. Mr. Sullivan's Overture contains the usual prettinesses and mannerisms which mark all his works: and in addition some very light and graceful strains which do not degenerate into triviality. The "Emperor" Concerto is the only piece we need notice in the second part. This magnificent work was magnificently performed, Mdme. Goddard transcending herself, and receiving a perfect furor of applause. The vocal pieces were well given. Sir M. Costa conducted the whole of the second part.

On Tuesday morning there was the usual crush to hear the "Messiah." The vocalists were Mdle. Tietjens, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdle. Drasdil, and Mdme. Patey; Mr. Cummings and Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley. Sir M. Costa conducted. As a matter of course all went well, and the audience appeared highly delighted. The receipts of the morning amounted to £2901.

A Musical Tour in North Germany.

BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.

(From the London Choir.)

WHEN I determined at the end of June to make a tour through North Germany, no gloomy forebodings of the turmoil which was destined so soon to harass the country, invaded my mind; fortunately, though war was declared only a few hours before I bade adieu to my friends on the other side of the water, nothing more serious than the mustering of troops and the commencement of other preparations for the coming fight occurred to interrupt my pleasant and peaceful occupation.

The start from Germany was not very propitious; the steamer "Wakefield," belonging to the Grimsby Navigation Company,—the courteousness of whose manager, Mr. Sutcliffe, many of your readers may have experienced,—being detained some six hours by the state of the weather. After this unavoidable delay, we sailed early on Sunday morning. On Monday we sighted Heligoland, and quickly reaching the mouth of the Elbe with its picturesque banks, now doubly interesting from the important part it plays in the war, we landed about three o'clock in the afternoon. I took up my quarters at the Hotel de l'Europe, beautifully situated, overlooking the Alster Basin.

Hamburg literally swarms with theatres and concert rooms. To some of these I repaired in the evening; but there is no music to be heard in these places without eating and drinking; yet all these gastronomic proceedings were carried on with such quiet and order that one's enjoyment of the music was scarcely ever marred. One of the largest of the second-class theatres (the principal ones being closed at this season of the year) is the "Theatre der Central Halle." Here (the admission to the stalls being only 4d.) after a drama, which appeared to interest the large audience amazingly, came a concert of rather a peculiar description. Eight ladies appeared on the stage, with their stringed instruments in their hands, and, accompanied by the band, played on violins and violoncellos, Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," an overture, and other pieces, with a remarkable taste, precision, and effect, which elicited long and loud applause, the "Wedding March" being redemanded. The orchestra then played several pieces, and I may here observe how I was struck not only upon this occasion, but also at other times, by the excellent way in which the wood and brass instruments were played; the tone invariably being softer and more refined than that of similar instruments in most of our theatrical bands.

By the kindness of an old and valued friend, and accomplished amateur, Herr Martin Herz, I was speedily introduced to most of the organists and composers of note in the town. The first organ I heard was at the church of St. Michael, celebrated for its great size and the height of its steeple. Herr Osterhult is the organist. This fine instrument, of about eighty stops, was built by Hildebrand, the principal workman of the famous Silbermann, the latter having died before he was able to carry out the plans he had designed for its erection. The interior arrangements are worthy of as much admiration as its noble exterior. The richly carved case, 60 feet in length by 60 feet in breadth, extends from one side of the church to the other, and has the towers usual to such cases, filled with brightly polished pure block-tin pipes, resplendent with gilded capitals. On the summits of these towers are gigantic figures of angels with golden trumpets; and in the centre, at the top of all, is an oil portrait of Mattheson, a celebrated composer and theorist, who bequeathed £4,000 to the organ fund. This instrument, with modifications, may be taken as a rough type of most of the large organs throughout North Germany. The variety, character, and pungency of tone in the flue work, is as admirable as their reeds and swell organs are poor and defective. The pedal organ, containing seventeen stops, possesses a power and individuality of tone rarely equalled; indeed I heard no finer in the whole of North Germany; but whilst it has a 32-foot metal of the finest quality, it has no 32-foot wood pipes, considered by so many in this country to be indispensable in a large instrument. The organist spared neither time nor trouble in exhibiting the qualities of an instrument of which he was justly proud. In a dignified performance of a fine fugue, the full power of its grand tones permeated the whole church, but the touch and mechanical arrangements I found from my own playing to be cumbersome and ancient. It is unnecessary to describe the organs in the other churches in Hamburg, as they are similar in character to that at S. Michael's; they all, however, possess a stop called "Glockenspiel," which is a set of bells from tenor F upwards, the largest being about 6 in. in diameter, the smallest about 1 in. These are struck with wood hammers, similar to those in a pianoforte, and, when used in conjunction with light 16 ft. and 2 ft. registers, produce for certain things very pleasing effects.

In the evening I attended one of the numerous concerts given in the charming gardens which are to be found in the environs of Hamburg. We had a performance by three military bands, numbering 120 players; they played separately and unitedly, the balance of tone being in both instances remarkably even and good. Amongst other pieces Wagner's well-known March in Tannhäuser was played by the united bands, where, at the passage of quavers in the bass towards the end of the composition, the combined brass instruments produced a stupendous effect. Individually, too, these bands executed both classical and popular music with a care, earnestness, and spirit which showed how much personal artistic interest the different performers took in the delightful work they had in hand.

And now on the next day I had the pleasure of spending a few delightful musical hours at the house of my friend, where I had the opportunity of seeing and hearing what German amateurs can accomplish, and what an interest they take in the practice and cultivation of music in its highest and most enjoyable form. The family assembled in a large room, denuded of its carpet, that the musical sounds might be heard to greater advantage. Our host being an accomplished violinist, and each member of his family playing some stringed instrument, there was here material for the performance of much excellent chamber music. First we had a classical overture, arranged as a duet for the pianoforte and a string quartet; then a violin solo, one of those charming romances by the old Italian masters, lately reprinted in Leipzig; then a Trio of Beethoven's, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; then some vocal music, and for a finale, another overture arranged as the first. Rarely have I heard, even amongst professional musicians, better music, better rendered, or more thoroughly enjoyed. I parted with my friend at the foot of his garden, close to whose gates I embarked on a steamer that took me down the Alster Basin to my hotel, reflecting during my short ride on the water upon the happy evening I had spent, and wondering when the charms of music will be so universally appreciated by English as they are by German families.

On the following day I was a guest at the annual dinner of the ship owners of Hamburg, Hull and Grimsby. On these occasions, after the third course, the toasts and speeches are given out between the succeeding courses; the favorite toasts are responded to musically, in a manner, I must own, very superior to our "Hip, hip, hurrah," and "For he's a jolly good fellow." All the guests sang in perfect time and tune, most of them being, as I ascertained, members of various choral and other associations for the practice of vocal part music.

The same night I left by mail for Berlin, where I arrived about five o'clock on Saturday morning. Here my first visit was to the veteran Wieprecht, the director-general of all the Prussian military bands. In his studio, a perfect model of neatness and order, was a tall cabinet reaching from the floor to the ceiling, and containing the scores of various compositions, all arranged by himself, which are played by each regiment in the Prussian army.

By his invitation I attended a performance by three of the best infantry bands in Berlin, each numbering about fifty or sixty performers. As at the military concert in Hamburg, they played with thrilling effect a programme of about twenty pieces separately and unitedly. In the music for the combined bands there was not that replication of parts so common in similar performances in England, but it was specially arranged so that each band in turn took its part accompanied by the others. The whole performance concluded with a military piece entitled the "Battle of Leipzig," in which cannons were fired at intervals with unerring precision at the beginning of the bar. This pleased me less than any other piece, but it seemed to raise the rest of the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

On the following morning, Sunday, I paid an eagerly anticipated visit to Professor Haupt, who has the reputation of being the greatest organist in Germany. On entering the parish church, where he presides at the organ, I found that the service had just commenced, and the congregation were singing, to the accompaniment of a fine organ, the favorite chorale, "Nun danket alle Gott."

Our fast organists in England, who drive their hymns at a railroad express pace, would have been astonished at the slow and dignified time in which this grand old tune was sung. Most of our readers will doubtless be aware that it is the practice of the Lutheran church throughout Prussia to sing congregational music in unison. But then everything is done to carry out this arrangement in the most efficient way—first, a really grand organ, containing from fifty to eighty sounding stops, with a full and penetrating tone, is placed in a huge gallery at the west end of the church, with plenty of space around to give the pipes room to speak; secondly, the people are furnished with books, in which are printed the melodies as well as the words of the chorales, and which, moreover, have this additional and immense advantage, that one tune is almost invariably confined to one set of words; thirdly, black boards are hung up with the numbers of the chorales distinctly printed with white chalk on them, so that those coming in late may at once know what hymn is being sung; fourthly, the knowledge of music, which all Germans are taught in one form or another at school, enables them to sing perfectly in tune. It is still the custom to play a few passing chords, similar to those in Hesse's arrangements of the chorales, between each line of the verse. The hymn is not played over, but is introduced by a short extemporaneous prelude, and the last verse is accompanied by the full power of the organ—a power which, in most cases, would be much more satisfactory, were the coarse reeds dispensed with. I am bound to add that these chorales, grand and majestic as they are, supply alone the musical part of the service: the versicles, preces, and responses of our own lovely service are not there; it would, indeed, have been a joy to have heard this relieved by the sweet and solemn tones of Tallis's responses, or by a service or anthem of one of our best church writers. Professor Haupt was most polite, and after the sermon he made an appointment with me for the following Tuesday morning, when I could hear the organ without interrupting any service. In the afternoon, at the Professor's suggestion, I visited the Church of S. Marien, a fine building, possessing one of the largest organs in Berlin, ably presided over by Herr Otto Diemel. The service and organ were both similar to those I had heard in the morning; the organ, however, was enclosed in a much handsomer and elaborately carved case. In the evening I went to the recently erected church of "The Cross," which has an immense dome in the centre, and is most richly and profusely decorated throughout. Here I found a large new instrument of four manuals, built by W. Sauer, of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. The organist is Herr Succo, an admirable writer of organ music, whose courtesy and kindness demand my warmest acknowledgments. The service began with a grand old chorale in G minor, and was of the same character as those I have mentioned above. After the service, the organist performed a "Toccata" of his own, and in other pieces displayed the various qualities of the instrument, which was not so fine in the flue work as the older organs, but much superior in reed work and mechanical appliances, the pneumatic lever being amongst the most valuable.

Almost the same remarks will apply to the large organ of four manuals, with a pedal organ of 15 stops, built in 1853 by Bushholtz and Sons, for the immense church of S. Peter, where Herr Heintz is the organist.

On Monday evening I visited the celebrated 'Kroll's' Gardens, in which there is an excellent theatre (chiefly used for the performance of operas), a military band, besides a large orchestra of fifty performers. Here I found the déité of Berlin. After a few morceaux by the military band, a bell rang, and all flocked to the theatre, where Mozart's Opera "Figaro" was performed most admirably, the orchestra especially distinguishing itself by the accuracy and delicacy of its accompaniments. After the opera, which commenced at six, and terminated at eight o'clock, there was a concert in the gardens. The programme included Weber's Overtures, "The Jubilee" and "Der Freischütz," the so-called "Meditation" by Bach and Gounod, operatic selections, and some pretty waltzes by Strauss. The orchestra included two harps. Amongst the most attentive of the listeners were a number of Prussian officers, splendid fellows, many of whom have, I fear, since paid the penalty which a ruthless war can inflict.

NEW WAR SONG. The correspondent of The London Telegraph, writing from in front of Strasbourg, says:

I inclose you a new war song, written here by a soldier, to the popular old tune of "Ich hatte einen Camerad." It is to be sung by the troops as they march into Strasbourg. Already the men have got hold of it, and sing it on march in chorus with harmonious emphasis. I heard it this afternoon chanted in unison by two battalions of the 1st Baden Grenadiers, and can assure you that the effect was excellent.

SONG OF THE GERMAN SOLDIERS IN ALSACE.

In Alsace, over the Rhine,
There lives a Brother of mine;
It grieves my soul to say
He hath forgot the day
We were one land and line.

Dear Brother, torn apart,
Is't true that changed thou art!
The French have clapped on thee
Red breeches, as we see;
Have they Frenchified thy heart?

Hark! that's the Prussian drum,
And it tells the time has come.
We have made one "Germany,"
One "Deutschland," firm and free;
And our civil strifes are dumb.

Thee also, fighting sore,
Ankle-deep in German gore,
We have won. Ah, Brother dear!
Thou art German—dost thou hear?
Thy shall never part us more.

Who made this song of mine?
Two comrades by the Rhine;—
A Saxonian man began it,
And a Pomeranian sang it,
In Alsace, on the Rhine.

M. CRÉMIEUX AND THE MARSEILLAISE. A correspondent of a London journal gives the following account of M. Crémieux, of the French Provisional Government, and a public assemblage which he attended. Having stated that the subject of M. Crémieux's speech was "The Marseillaise Hymn," the writer proceeds:

M. Crémieux is now 74, though his voice and spirited bearing showed no symptoms of this advanced age, and no less than 50 years ago he made his first hit as a rising advocate, by his defense of four prisoners accused of singing that "seditious song, the Marseillaise." From a book recording the history of his triumph, M. Crémieux read to the audience (or rather delivered over again—it was given with so much gusto and spirit) his speech as a young barrister of 24, describing with great naïveté how he horrified the Judge, but charmed and conciliated the jury, by reading in full court the "seditious song" with all the emphasis and fire of which he was capable—committing himself in fact, as it were, over again the very crime with which the client he was defending was charged. However, the ruse answered its purpose. The verdict was a triumphant acquittal, and M. Crémieux was thenceforth a made man. The jury could not have been more pleased with the young advocate than the Porte St. Martin audience were with the veteran of 74, and M. Crémieux ran apparently some risk of being encored, when he was rescued from this trying compliment by the advance of Mille. Agar to sing the song he had just been discouraging upon—the Marseillaise. Her voice was not very remarkable either for sweetness or strength, but her management of it was good, and her play of features singularly striking and impressive. Her dress was that of the classical Goddess of Liberty—a tunic of simple white dropping loosely over her figure, the expressive movements of which it neither fettered nor concealed, and leaving the arms bare. Her long black hair falling dishevelled down her shoulders, and dark eyes full of the fire of enthusiasm, gave her almost the appearance of one inspired, and when at the last stanza she grasped the tricolor flag and, kneeling down, half shrouded herself in its folds, the entire audience, which filled every corner and crevice of the theatre from gallery to floor, rose to their feet simultaneously as by the same impulse, and with one voice burst into that most magnificent of popular refrains, the "Aux armes citoyens!"

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 24, 1870.

Some Recent Musical Publications.

"PIANO AND MUSICAL MATTER", one of the many new instruction books or manuals for students of the piano-forte, by Mlle. G. DE LA MOTTE, has excited a good deal of attention during the short year of its existence, partly by the uncommonly handsome and attractive style in which the book is printed; partly by the enterprise with which it has been launched into the world and never suffered to escape the watchful and protecting eye of newspaperdom for more than a brief interval; as well as by the high reputation which the author has justly earned by her experience as a teacher, and by the clever way in which the book combines, in a small compass, a great many practical hints, historical abstracts, glimpses into fundamental principles and theory of music, with the necessary first steps and exercises in piano playing.

The Introduction tells us: "This book contains only what is absolutely necessary to be known by every one who wishes to play well on the piano." We think it contains more: for what is the "absolute necessity" of a young piano student's knowing "proslamlenomenos," or anything at all about the old Greek modes and terminology? Yet to this are devoted three out of the six pages of Musical History, with which the work opens. For the rest the sketch is well enough, as a reminder of the dates and sequence of musical discoveries and composers down to Schumann. The important name of Dufay, however, is wanting, in the enumeration of the great men of the old Flemish school; and later, one looks, seeing Clementi and Dussek, but looks in vain, for Cramer, who certainly had something to do with the development of piano-forte music. Some little inaccuracies and ambiguities of language mar the clearness of this chapter. "Between the first and the second was a diatonic semitone, and this they called a tetrachord."—what? the semitone? Again "the value of the notes" is made to mean sometimes "the interval between them" (!) and sometimes their length of duration,—which is certainly confusing.—But these and similar imperfections of language in other parts of the book, are not of vital consequence, nor fatal to the whole; they are pardonable enough to a French lady trying to express her thought in English. Still less important is the spelling of Terpander as "Therpander."

After the history we have "How Music exists in Nature," which is a good and philosophical beginning, showing very properly how one tone generates all tones, and the trine origin of the diatonic scale. Very briefly, but clearly; and it was well to put this first.

The next head is "Musical Sounds and their Pitch," treating of vibrations, intervals, the ruinous effect on voices of the too high modern pitch, &c. Under this head, too, are rather miscellaneously grouped useful little hints about jarring noises in pianos, and a list (catalogue raisonné) of the instruments which compose an orchestra;—in which, by the way, we note repeatedly the word "timpanis," which is plural to excess, as if we were to say sopranis, or frets, geeses, mens. But when it is stated that "an Orchestra is never composed of other than the above-named instruments," we are forced to notice that the list does not include the ophicleid, bass tuba, harp, and many more which sometimes are used.

The next division "What Music is Composed of," treats (in less than three pages,—which is the concise and sketchy method of the whole book in its presentation of "Musical Matter"), of rhythm, melody, harmony, counterpoint, fugue, &c. Of all this, of course, it is well to have some right idea; and the terms are well enough defined, except that Counterpoint, simply, in the general, is confounded with Double Counterpoint.—The same division or chapter (by what association of ideas we know not) treats of "Classical and Modern Music," the "difference between a Symphony and Concerto," "What is a Partition or Score," and Maelzel's Metronome. We cannot but think it rather rash and uncalled for, in such a book, so briefly, and for young pupils, to attempt to define "Classical" music. We are told it is "that in which the laws of harmony are observed in their full severity and perfection." But that is, or should be, the case with all music, whether classical or not. The term is very vaguely used by all, and definition might be prudently avoided,—at least, unless one had plenty of room.

And now we come to something quite naive. "Who should take music lessons?" is the heading. After being informed that "music elevates the soul, soothes the heart," &c., &c., we are told who are the happy ones who should take lessons. They are divided into three classes: 1. those who have great musical talent; 2. those who have less musical talent; 3. those who have no musical talent, provided they have some ear. All of which points to a jolly good time coming, when business for teachers, publishers, composers, will indeed be lively.—Included also in this episodic section, are: the qualifications of a good teacher, how to learn to read at sight, how to subscribe at music stores, and how to have music bound:—practical, certainly.

And here we enter upon the strictly practical and more substantial matter of the book,—that which pertains to learning to play the piano-forte. Excellent rules about the economy of daily practice; descriptions of the different kinds of "touch," with the signs that modify it; the rules of "fingering," with well chosen illustrations; signs and abbreviations, &c.,—all quite precise and clear,—bring us to the heart of the matter, which is embodied in twelve chapters, which the pupil has to work upon, until, step by step, he becomes master of them all. This is the usual practical matter of piano-forte "methods;" in substance like them all, but more carefully and practically presented than we often find. Indeed we know not that a better manual could be devised. The rudiments, directions, exercises, and the little pieces (few and far between, which is wise), are all to the purpose. One may wonder, however, what is gained, or what is meant, by calling the two-four measure "direct," and the three-four "indirect." All measure, musical movement, is direct; it does not turn aside. Still more must the learner be puzzled when he reads that "Rhythm is an uneven division of time." Doubtless the author had a right idea, but hit upon a wrong word to express it.

We cannot entirely accept Mlle. de la Motte's theory of the Minor Scale, nor do we think that problem ever has been solved to perfect satisfaction. She properly distinguishes between the harmonic and the melodic minor scale, but concludes that "it is an impossibility to have a minor scale in its integrity;" i. e. she rejects the real, which is the harmonic, minor scale, because it contains what she calls a "forbidden" interval (of a tone and half) between the sixth and seventh. Why "forbidden," if it do actually result from the harmony, the chords of the three fundamental tones (Tonic, Sub dominant and Dominant), which furnish the tones of the minor as well as of the major scale? Is it not more philosophical, more true to intrinsic law, to regard the harmonic as the only bona fide minor scale, the only one justified by the harmony, and to regard the melodic minor scale as merely a pleasing and convenient modification of it for mere melodic purposes. For, if you can arrange the intervals one way in ascending and another way in descending, you have already two melodic scales; then why not more, since both are arbitrary? Recall those runs in that mysterious, terrific passage in the beginning of the overture and the ghost scene of Don Giovanni, and you will find that Mozart knew how to use several more scales than are included under our categories of major and minor, and thereby convey a feeling as if the "great globe" were unsettled and the crack of doom at hand. But we must acknowledge that the author has reasoned out her case with much ability, showing insight and discrimination. Rarely have we seen so much brought to so baffling a problem.

To the twelve chapters, which bring the pupil as far as the understanding of Relative Keys, the Dominant Seventh Chord, &c., are appended a very careful and precise explanation of the various "Melodic Ornaments," an illustration of "Transposition," some good "Accented Exercises," and a good variety, cleverly harmonized, of forms or patterns of "Modulation." The list of "Piano compositions most useful in a private musical Library" is entirely classical. The whole concludes with quite a full Dictionary of Musical Terms, which is for the most part accurate, bating considerable misspelling, and now and then grammatical irration, as where the noun bravura is defined by the adverb bravely and the adjective spirited. All these things can be easily corrected as the book passes through new editions; and we are pleased to see that it has so far established itself in favor as to have already reached the fourth edition, which is improved by the addition of several more good pieces fingered and otherwise explained, from Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Spindler, Clementi, and others.

On the whole, the little book is "unique" in matter, as well as inviting in form, and appearance. It is a compendium, in brief, of a great many matters which every, even the merest pupil ought to know concerning music. It leads him in a sound direction as to artistic culture, so far as it goes, and to the formation of good habits in piano practice so far as a book can do it.

—This fourth edition bears the imprint of Lee & Shepard (book-sellers) as publishers; it was originally published by White, Smith & Perry (music-dealers).

Mendelssohn's music to Racine's "Athalie" has just been issued by Oliver Ditson & Co., vocal and piano score, making a valuable addition to their list of Oratorios in octavo form. This, with the "St. Matthew Passion Music" of Sebastian Bach, and Handel's "Samson," makes out a good account for one year. "Athalie" will be excellent practice for Oratorio Societies and Choral Clubs,—an easier and shorter task than the great Oratorios, and yet not less rewarding.

The same publishers have in press two more volumes of their series of musical literature, commenced by Leypoldt in New York, and continued here in the same beautiful and artistic style; (We need only remind the reader of the Mendelssohn Letters, Mozart's Letters, Liszt's "Chopin," the Life of Rossini, &c., &c.) One of the new works, nearly ready, will be the Lectures on Music delivered last year in New York by Mr. F. L. Ritter, of which we copied an abstract at the time, and which will be of great interest to all students of the history of music. The volume will include the musical illustrations drawn by Mr. Ritter out of his rich stores of music of all times. The other will be a reprint of a work always in demand at all our libraries, but now out of print; the LIFE OF BEETHOVEN BY MOSKHELES, based on the German biography by SCHINDLER, and published at least thirty years ago in London in two volumes. Of course it is not such a Life of Beethoven as we are bound to have eventually—at least if Mr. Thayer shall ever finish and bring out his long expected great work;—but it happens to be the only biography of much account that yet exists in the English language, and it is full of interesting matter, even if not so complete and accurate in all points as one could wish. The book is continually asked for, and it is time that a fresh supply of copies should be furnished.

NEW HAVEN is to have its Beethoven Festival, and on a brave and generous scale. They have organized a "Beethoven Festival Association" for the purpose, of which Hon. James E. English is President, Thomas G. Shepard, Secretary, G. J. Stoeckel, Mus. Doc., Chairman of the Committee on Music. It will be held early in December, occupying two days, with two performances each day; and the music will be wholly, or almost wholly, from the works of Beethoven. Among those mentioned are the Choral (ninth) Symphony, the Mass in C, and the opera Fidelio, to be given with all the dramatic effects. Truly a formidable undertaking for New Haven, or indeed for any city in America! We heartily trust it may succeed, and do honor to the musical love and culture of the City of Elms as well as to the memory of the great composer.

Mr. ERNST PERABO has laid out his plans for a series of four Piano-forte Martinées, at Chickering's new ware rooms, on the following dates: Oct. 28, Nov. 11, Nov. 25, and Dec. 9. Mr. Kreissmann will sing in the first one (something from Bach's Passion Music); Mrs. C. A. Barry in the second; Mr. Wulf Fries will play a Sonata in the third; and Messrs. Schultze and Fries will join Mr. Perabo in a Trio on Dec. 9.—Mr. Perabo will also furnish one of the Beethoven Concerts during the Birth-day week, namely a Matinée, at noon, on the actual birthday, Saturday, Dec. 17, offering among other things the great B-flat Trio, op. 97.

On the 14th inst. Mr. Perabo (by request) gave a concert in Brandon, Vermont, where he has been passing a portion of the summer. He was assisted by Miss Lizzie Sanderson, vocalist, of Brandon. This was the programme:

Dedication Overture—op. 124, Beethoven.
(Written for the inauguration of a theatre in Vienna).
Arranged by E. Pauer.
Songs, { A.—"The Forest Birds are Singing," op. 10 No. 6, Rob. Franz.
B.—"Good Night," op. 5 No. 7, Rob. Franz.
March and Finale, from a Serenade for four hands, op. 6, A. Krause.
Arranged by Ernst Perabo.
Andante with Variations, from a String Quartet in D minor, F. Schubert.
Arranged by Ernst Perabo.
Song, "He the Best of all, the Noblest," R. Schumann.
"Home, Sweet Home"—Fantasia for Piano, S. Thalberg.

HOME AGAIN. With the first cool days of Autumn the tide of genial, æsthetic life sets back again toward the city. Music during the hot summer seemed to the city-bound a dream of the past and very vague hope of the future. But with September all are here again, with busy hum of preparation. Our artists and teachers have nearly all returned.

Mr. LANG arrived on Tuesday, after a year's stay in Europe, with health thoroughly restored, enriched with musical experience and strong for the winter's work. Mr. LEONARD's genial, smiling presence is no longer missed. He has been spending two months in the bracing air of the White Mountains, at Jefferson, New Hampshire, and will soon be heard from not only in the Symphony Concerts, but we trust also in a course of Chamber Concerts of his own. Mrs. BARRY, in better health and voice than ever, cutting short her rich stay in Italy, on account of the stormy outlook of the times, is again with us, already sought by pupils and by concert-givers; and what indeed can Oratorio and the higher class of Concerts do without her? Mrs. JULIA (HOUSTON) WEST, we are glad to learn, does not intend to hide the light of her soprano under the domestic bushel. Mr. B. LISTMANN, our admirable violinist, will return soon from Germany, and bring with him a wife. The Symphony Concert public, as well as the friends of classical Chamber Music, rejoice to know that the Mendelssohn Quintette Club will remain at home this winter,—at least will make "the Hub" headquarters.

One thing there is to cloud the prospect. Many a circle of sincerest music-lovers will regret to learn that there is small chance of seeing OTTO DRESER back this winter. So pure and true an artistic spirit, so positive and quickening an influence, is more and more missed in Boston. The poor condition of his health, for a whole year past, makes his plans uncertain. May the mountain air of Switzerland, where we last heard from him, rapidly restore him! For we have always work that waits for such a man.

CHRISTINE NILSSON. The debut of the Swedish singer in New-York, last Monday evening, seems to have realized the wildest expectations. The Sun, of the next morning, says:

The audience that gathered at Steinway Hall last evening was certainly duly impressed with the artistic importance of the occasion. It was not a common audience, or an indifferent one, but represented fully the critical, literary, and artistic portion of our citizens. It was great in numbers, overflowing the large hall and filling half the smaller one, the connecting doors being thrown open. It was attentive, excited and expectant. The programme opened gravely and seriously. It was so arranged that nothing frivolous or even light should precede the entrance of Miss Nilsson. First came the ever lovely Oberon overture, into which Von Weber has woven so much of his romantic spirit. Then the "Gratias Agimus Tibi," the fine trio from Rossini's mass, full of dignity and devoutness of spirit. After these, Mr. VIEUXTEMPS played his ballad and polonaise—a work that he performed hero in his last visit, and with which his brethren of the bow have kept his memory green at many a concert since. It is a composition nobly conceived, and was finely executed, and certainly would have won its author a recall under any other circumstances. But the audience was waiting with intensity of expectation for the prima donna, and all the other members of the company, even Vieuxtemps, for this evening at least, stood in her shadow. Hardly had the doors closed behind Mr. Vieuxtemps than they swung open again to admit upon the stage as fair and noble and gentle a presence as ever passed their threshold. Miss Nilsson's pictures look like her in form, but they fail even to suggest the animation and brightness and sunny beauty that glows upon her fair face. She is tall and slender and graceful. A blonde like most of her countrywomen, and yet not what Dr. Holmes calls a washed-out blonde, but one in whom the color comes and goes. She was perfectly at her ease, and made herself at once at home with her audience. There are some persons, as we all know, who have the happy faculty of placing themselves at once in harmonious relation with their public, while others remain forever cold and isolated and unsympathetic. Miss Nilsson is eminently one of the former class and will carry the popular enthusiasm with her wherever she goes. As she stood before the audience, dressed with the most scrupulous simplicity in white, even the loopings of the dress and the ornaments in the hair being plain white flowers, her blue eyes looking with kindness about her, and her face radiant with good nature, a picture was presented of purity and beauty that satisfied every expectation. The lady was greeted with the heartiest of welcomes. When these had subsided, the audience composed itself to listen.

Miss Nilsson had chosen with exceeding good taste and feeling to introduce herself to the public through the medium of one of Handel's most religious and spiritual songs—the familiar aria, "Angels ever Bright and Fair." It was sung by Miss Nilsson after her own fashion, quite unlike the way in which it is ordinarily given—with more liberties with the time and phrasing, with greater elevation of sentiment and religious feeling. It showed the great beauty of her voice, the perfect evenness of its register, her entire command over it, and capacity for singing broad, large cantabile movements. Subsequently Miss Nilsson sang a great scena from Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, full of transitional emotion, being, in fact, Ophelia's mad scene. And in this she manifested so much dramatic power as to make every one regret that the prospect of seeing her in opera is so remote.

An aria from Verdi's "Traviata" completed the solos sung by Miss Nilsson. These difficult selections showed how varied were her powers; how flexible her voice, how faultless, smooth and pure in tone, and also how powerful. In this latter quality it was most of all a surprise, for the reports from abroad spoke of her as an organ of medium power. Steinway Hall may have been peculiarly adapted to it: certainly its volume was all-sufficient there. Miss Nilsson undoubtedly stands on the threshold of as great achievements here as she has made in Europe. The close of her concert last evening was a real ovation. The stage was barricaded with flowers, from prodigious harps requiring three men to lift them on to the platform to the smallest bouquets. This was not much, however. The genuine test of appreciation was in the way in which the audience rose to meet her when she appeared in response to the final recall.

Next (says the Tribune) to the prima donna herself, the artist whose appearance attracted most interest last night was Miss ANNIE LOUISE CARY, the contralto. She is a Boston young lady, who has spent some years in Europe, studying under good masters, and singing with marked success in London, where she was engaged with Nilsson at the Royal Italian Opera. She has an admirable voice, full, deep, round, and mellow—a voice like that of Adelaide Phillips, with a great deal of that peculiarly sweet and touching quality which seems to belong more or less to all American girls who have any voice at all. She has been trained in an excellent school, and is likely to prove a credit to her country. She sang last night the Ah! quel Giorno from "Semiramide," and took part in the Gratias Agimus trio from Rossini's Mass. Mr. VERGER, the new male singer, has an agreeable and moderately strong baritone voice, ranging toward the tenor, and carefully cultivated after the imperfect French school. He was very well received.

The rehearsals of the Handel & Haydn Society, of Mr. Kreisemann's "Cecilia," and of Mr. Parker's Singing Club, will be resumed in the first week of October. Each of these organizations is studying out its problem of a Beethoven concert for the centennial birthday week in December.

The Bonn Festival in honor of Beethoven, under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, was to have been held last week, but "under the existing circumstances, many of the intending performers being either wounded or dead," it is of course postponed. The new Beethoven Hall, which was to have been used for it, is now occupied as a hospital.

Our Parisian contemporary, Le Menestrel, in the last number we received (Aug. 28), announces a suspension during the month of September,—which probably will have to last for sometime longer. All the French musical journals, after reducing their size during the war, are now silenced altogether.

The correspondents of the daily papers give some interesting accounts of the manner in which the victorious Prussians have spent their Sundays on French territory. The celebration of the Holy Communion has been the rule even in the battle-field, and the bystanders are said to have been struck with astonishment at the heartiness with which the soldiers joined in the well-known chorales, accompanied by their bands.

Wagner's Last Opera.

MUNICH, July, 1870.

"The Walkyræ" is the title of Richard Wagner's new opera just produced at the Munich Opera House. It is the second of a series of four, all founded upon the old German mythology and intended for representation on four successive evenings. The text was written by Wagner himself and printed eight years ago. He offered it to the public as a poem worthy of esteem for its own sake, but it is very generally and justly condemned as deficient in metrical grace, elegance of expression, and above all in clearness. It is well adapted however to singing, and is alliterative in many parts. Wagner rides a hobby, which he calls by the magnificent name of "The National Musical Drama." The "Meistersinger of Nuremberg" is the first thoroughly national comedy. The series of four operas entitled "The Ring of the Nibelungen," is, above all others, from the Wagner point of view, the culmination of true national tragedy. It is to have an immense influence over the national intellect and is to create a truly national stage. The present generation will not appreciate all this, but future generations will be sensible of their debt of gratitude to the great composer of this century. Meyerbeer, Rossini and Gounod will be lost to memory when the name of Wagner shall rise to the zenith of its glory. So says Richard Wagner, and so say his few devoted sympathizers. For the reputation of German literature, we should be sorry to consider "The Ring of the Nibelungen" as the most glorious climax of its tragedy. It certainly, however, must be considered as the climax of Wagner's peculiar ideas. His intention was to bring before the German nation a picture of their own early German Mythology, and he has therefore drawn his plot entirely from the old legends. We find them all tangled up with the Scandinavian and the Greek mythology, but telling a pretty straight and consistent story. The Edda-sage or legends, the Walsunge-sage and the Niflunga-sage were collected, (probably by the poet Kiirenborger) in the early part of the twelfth century into the so-called Nibelungen-lieder-songs or legends.

The principal characters of the old mythology that Wagner has introduced are Wotan or Odin: who holds the relative position of Jupiter in the Greek mythology. Fricka is Wotan's spouse and the special protectress of married people. Fricka is also called Frouwa and Freia, from which comes our Friday. Her chariot is drawn, according to some of the legends, by cats, and according to others, by rams. The gods were only made and kept immortal by eating the apples guarded by Freia, the goddess of immortality, who figures prominently in the "Rhinegold."

"Wal" signifies a corpse, from which come "Walstatt," the place where the heroes die, Walhalla, the resting place of fallen heroes, and Walkyre. These were the goddesses who carried the fallen heroes from the battlefield to their heavenly home in the halls of Walhalla.

The Walkyræ were nine in number, and they held the position of cup-bearers to the gods and the heroes who had fallen in single combat and had been transported to Walhalla. Brunnhild is Wotan's favorite Valkyræ,—is the offspring of Wotan and Fricka, and impersonates the

Will of Wotan. Besides these personages, we find the god of fire, "Loge,"—the three Normen or fates, Fasner, the giant, Donner, or Vulcan, and a host of nymphs and fairies.

The cast of the parts was thus:

Wotan (bass.), Herr Kindermann.
Fricka (mezzo-sop.), Frl. Kauffmann.
Brunnhild (soprano), Frl. Stehle.
Hunding (bass.), Herr Bauserwein.
Sieglinde (soprano), Frau Vogl.
Sigmund (tenor), Herr Vogl.

The musical prelude is only five minutes long, and in Wagner's characteristic style. It begins with a restless movement, and passes by an easy transition to a wild, stormy passage, where the effect is chiefly produced by the high and monotonous violin part being sustained, while great waves of sound made by the wind instruments and double basses continually swell and decrease. A short decrescendo follows and the curtain rises, showing a large, rudely built hall, with an oak tree in the centre, a large fireplace, an immense wooden door at the back and some primitive looking furniture. The first act is composed of uninterrupted solos. It is all in an andante recitative, becoming allegro in moments of passion and excitement. Once during the love-scene of the two who have most of the music of this act, a sudden blast is heard, the back door is blown open, showing a beautiful landscape on the Rhine, and the moon throws down its soft light on the two lovers and renders the scene supremely picturesque. Here Wagner for a moment forgot himself, and the national drama, and introduced what might almost be called a melody. The accompaniment is soft and tremulous, a perfect musical representation of shimmering moonlight.

The second act, like the first, is composed of solos only. The music becomes more agitated and offers a better opportunity for the expression of varied emotions, which for the voices are restricted, however, to the dignified andante recitative for narration and the loud, confused, and hurried movements denoting rage and excitement. The ending of the second act is a tableau of Hunding and Sigmund fighting together on the rocks while Brunnhild and Wotan are visible in the clouds above, surrounded by a flood of light. Both the warriors fall and the gods disappear.

Another short musical prelude precedes the third act. It is wild beyond expression and very premonitory; the flutes and flutes sustain an accompaniment of high runs that sound almost like human shrieks. The scene opens in a wild forest glen, with huge rocks in the centre and caverns on either side. Eight Valkyræ amuse themselves in clambering up and down the rocks, relieving the monotony of the previous solos by singing in concert. Brunnhild rushes excitedly in and calls on them for protection for Sieglinde and herself, from Wotan's wrath. The first half of the act consists of hurried, monotonous, excited questions and responses by the various Valkyræ, ending on the approach of Wotan by a stormy, agitated accompaniment to the voices. Wotan then appears, summons Brunnhild and declares her unworthy to be a Valkyræ any longer. The prettiest passages in the whole opera are two octets by the Valkyræ, full of expression and almost melodious, in which they entreat Wotan's pardon in behalf of their sister; but he will not yield, and they make another final effort, which is a marvellous musical production. There is not a discordant note, and yet the effect produced is like that of a score of frightened, excited women, all begging and crying and screaming at the top of their feminine lungs. Wotan then dismisses the eight Valkyræ and retains Brunnhild. A long and tedious recitative follows, and finally Wotan kisses her eyes and she falls asleep. He lays her down under a tree on a little mound and she escapes through a trap door arrangement. Wotan draws a circle around the mound with his spear and the flames spring up. There is a mass of flame on the stage, at least fifteen feet long, that shoots up eight or ten feet, and the curtain falls.

The Orchestra was composed of over eighty musicians and performed its part with admirable precision and delicacy of light and shade. The voices were all mature and sympathetic, and sustained the many long, severe, high-pitched passages so well, that it showed how much training they had endured. No Italian troupe could have sung them.

The opera was magnificently put on the stage. The sky in the 3d act could not be surpassed. At first, it was dark with heavy cumulous clouds, that broke away imperceptibly and gave place to a lighter scirrous mass, and these became gradually lighted, up until the whole was a perfect representation of the eastern sky in a flood of glory just before the rising of the sun. The fire tableau at the close is certainly well managed, but its risk cannot be excused. The interest attached to it is merely the pleasurable excitement of danger. It shows a great lack of ingenuity to devise a spectacle whose chief and only merit is that of exciting an emotion of personal danger in the minds of the audience.

The verdict respecting "The Valkyræ" must be similar to that of the "Rhinegold." It is a superb pantomime with a grand, effective, powerful accompanying symphony. The dramatic portion displays great monotony, is spun out to a weary length, affords no scope for anything but the extremes of passive listening and wringing the hands and tearing the hair, and is badly arranged in reference to its climaxes. The musical part is graphic and impressive. It expresses almost every known human feeling. It is dignified and grand; it is wavering, doubtful and dreamy; it is victorious, agitated and wild; it is pathetic and tender; it is never weak; it is never melodious.

"The Valkyræ" must be utterly condemned as an opera. There is not a single quartet, trio or duo in it, nor even an air that any common musician could sing after hearing the opera. It will probably never be given on any other stage than this at Munich. The curtain is up for four hours, and the elaborate mise en scène, —the elaborate orchestration of the music and the richness of the voices alone, render this grand national musical drama tolerable. The inevitable feeling that every one must experience after hearing the Valkyræ is one of regret, that the fantastic notions and theories of so great a composer as Wagner should have diverted his genius into such an unpleasing channel and deprived us of much music that might have been at once intelligible and melodious. The house was crowded, and the audience applauded loudly, but were moved to enthusiasm more from personal interest in the singers than from admiration of the "Valkyræ" as an opera.

The London Musical Season.

[From the Musical Times, Sept. 1.]

By HENRY C. LUNN.

The hopeful signs of the progress of music in England are by no means so numerous as sanguine enthusiasts would lead us to imagine; for if we separate the worshippers of Art from the worshippers of artists, we shall find that the former class is in a sad minority. A record of the past season, thrown into the conventional language of the usual résumé, would be merely a recapitulation of so many former seasons, that it might almost have been set up in type at the beginning of the year, with a few blanks left for the filling in of names and dates. Certainly, two Opera-houses have been opened, the old established Musical Societies have given the stipulated number of concerts, and all has been done that the fashionable world requires. But where shall we turn for the proof that the appreciation of the highest class of music is steadily on the increase? At the Opera the favorite singers in their favorite parts have been the real attraction, whilst "Medea," and "Fidelio," have been given just enough to make the classicalists long for more; and the two hitherto unknown Operas, "L'Oca del Cairo" and "Abu Hassan," have been played two or three times to comparatively empty houses. It is true that Wagner's Opera, "Der Fliegende Holländer," must be accepted as a welcome novelty; but neither Campana's "Esmeralda" nor Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon" are the works which would have been chosen by a management accustomed to cater for an audience of highly cultivated taste. In the popular Oratorios, operatic singers have filled concert-rooms to overflowing, whilst comparatively unknown sacred works have been left to struggle into notice on the principle, we presume, that love of art is a virtue which should be its own reward. With the exception of the really fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Antigone" by Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, and the single presentation of Beethoven's Mass in D—altered to suit the requirements of the Sacred Harmonic Society—the "Oratorio Concerts" alone have shown activity in the performance of any but the well-worn works which for years have represented the classical element; and although much interest has been excited amongst the music-loving few, by the revival at these concerts of two of the greatest compositions of the master minds in creative art, and the production of a new Sacred Cantata, by a modern composer, the many are almost unconscious that any unusual occurrence has disturbed the even flow of the London "Musical Season." Whether a steady perseverance in the good cause may eventually alter this state of things, it would be impossible to predict; but, meantime, let us not believe that the taste of musical England is rapidly improving, simply because it has so long been the fashion to say so. The fact we have stated is undeniable—no good, therefore, can be effected by refusing to believe it, and no harm can be done by boldly stating it.

At the Royal Italian Opera, the pertinacity with which Madlle. Sessi was put forward in so many parts already identified with artists actually in the establishment, must have appeared extraordinary to those who believe that the secret of operatic management should mainly consist in making the best of the material at command. That Madlle. Sessi has many excellent qualifications, both as a singer and an actress, cannot be questioned; but although the audience welcomed her in such parts as Lucia and Maria, in "La Figlia del Reggimento," it was scarcely to be expected that those who had witnessed the exquisite performance of Madlle. Nilsson as Ophelia, in Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," should have accepted a representative of this character, whose chief recommendations were a fixed resolution to overcome difficulties and a blissful unconsciousness of failure. Had Madlle. Sessi understood the limit of her own powers or placed herself under the guidance of her real friends, she would have maintained a much higher position during the season; for in many parts which did not demand more than carefully cultivated vocal execution and ordinary knowledge of the stage, she was received, as she deserved, with the utmost amount of favor. Madlle. Cari, who made her début as Maffeo Orsini, in "Lucrezia Borgia," gave us but little opportunity to judge of her powers, for after this one performance, she joined the company of the rival establishment at Drury Lane. Of Madlle. Oina, who appeared in the small part of Papagena, in "Il Flauto Magico," we can speak most favorably; and Madlle. Madigan, in some very important secondary characters during the season, proved herself a reliable member of the company. Madlle. Titens still reigns without a rival in those parts with which the public is now accustomed to associate her name, wisely abstaining from courting mere versatility at the expense of her high reputation. This season, however, she has added another character to her already extensive répertoire, that of the Queen, in Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," the whole of the music of which she sings with a dramatic power, showing how thoroughly the heart of a true artist is always in her work. Madame Adelina Patti was so effective as Esmeralda, in Campana's feeble Opera of that name, that we are almost inclined to fear that it was at her desire the work was produced. If so, this affords one more instance of the manner in which the destinies of the operatic world are ruled by vocalists, a fact which should in justice be put forward when the apparently eccentric actions of lessees have to be canvassed. Madame Pauline Lucca's singing remains as unfinished as ever; but her pleasing person and winning manner satisfy the many; and the characters which most require these latter qualities are therefore those which she should adhere to: certainly Angela, in Auber's "Le Domino noir," will scarcely add to her reputation. Madame Vanzini and Madlle. Scacchi have, as before, proved of much service during the season; and amongst those who have ably supported subordinate parts, we must mention Mesdames Bauermeister and Locatelli. The tenor department has been, as usual, unsatisfactory. Herr Wachtel, whose high chest notes and prodigious physical power have deceived many persons into the notion that he was a fine singer, departed suddenly, having previously written an explanatory letter to the papers which nobody cared about; Signor Mario has again exhibited to us how very gradual is the decay of a voice which has been properly trained; Dr. Gunz has sung well some purely German parts; Signor Vizzani, a new comer, has displayed a fairly good voice and style; and Signor Marino as Corentino, in Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," was highly effective; but, with the exception of Signor Naudin, always a reliable and conscientious artist, the company is as far off as ever from possessing a tenor upon whom the subscribers and the public can depend with confidence. Signor Cotogni has materially advanced his reputation by his performance of Hamlet, in Ambroise Thomas's Opera; and Graziani, if he had not added to, has, at least, supported his previous position. Signori Ciampi, Bagagiolo, Tagliafico, Capponi, M. Petit, &c., have been of infinite value in strengthening the cast of several well-known works; and Signor Caravoglia, a new Bass, has also been deservedly well received. The catalogue of unfulfilled promises is not this year large; but we regret that Verdi's "Macbeth" was not given; for although not passionately attached to the music of this composer, we can imagine that the Lady Macbeth of Madlle. Titens must be one of the finest performances on the lyric stage. The two conductors, Signori Vianesi and Beignani, have done their best to support a bad system, no amount of exertion, even with more experienced directors, having the slightest chance of a really successful result where the bâton is constantly changing hands. Whether this method will be persevered in next season, we cannot say; for it now seems certain that Mr. Gye is to reign supreme over the fortunes of the Royal Italian Opera, and that Mr. Mapleson is to become lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre.

At Drury Lane Mr. Wood assembled an excellent company; and had he not relied too exclusively upon the attraction of Madlle. Nilsson, he would no doubt have had a more successful season. The subscribers and the public, however, were taught to expect the great Swedish vocalist on most of the principal evenings; and the consequence was that when she became too ill to appear, although several well-tried works, with well-tried singers, were given, the house was comparatively empty. It is unnecessary to record the successes of Madlle. Nilsson in all her well-known parts; but we may say that her exquisite singing as Alice, in "Roberto il Diavolo," Desdemona, in "Otello," and Mignon, in Ambroise Thomas's Opera, has materially raised her in public estimation. Madlle. Ilma di Murska has always been accepted as an efficient and reliable artist; but we were perfectly unprepared for so excellent—we might indeed say absolutely perfect—a performance, both vocally and histrionically, as that of Senta, in Wagner's "Der Fliegende Holländer." To execute the music of this part was no easy task for the most accomplished vocalist; but so thoroughly to realize the conception of a composer who places as much reliance upon the actor as upon the singer, and whose every musical phrase is instinct with the accompanying dramatic action, proves beyond doubt the possession of a creative power which almost amounts to genius. Madame Volpini has done much during the season to advance herself in public favor, especially by her brilliant vocalization as Filina, in Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon." We expected more from Madame Monbelli, considering the effect she invariably created in the concert-room. It is still possible, however, that practise on the stage may enable her to take that place in an operatic company for which her voice and style eminently fit her. Every endeavor was made to place Madlle. Reboux in the first rank during the season; but although undoubtedly an experienced singer, the unfortunate tremulousness of her voice—which she evidently rather encouraged than repressed—prevented the possibility of her retaining the post of prima donna, even during the temporary indisposition of Madlle. Nilsson. Of Madlle. Lewitzky, we have still great hopes; for although her excellent singing as Isabella, in Mozart's "L'Oca del Cairo," excited expectations which were not realized in her Zerlina, she is so young, and appears to possess so much intelligence, that we confidently look forward to her successful re-appearance at some future time. No regret was felt at the disappearance of Madame Barbot, after her single performance of Valentine, in the "Huguenots," but Madlle. Savertal, who was announced in the prospectus, and of whom we have heard favorable report, would probably have been a welcome addition to the company; and, at least, her appearance would have absolved the lessee from the charge of not fulfilling one of the important promises in his opening programme. Madlle. Cari (who, from some unexplained cause, came over from the rival establishment) displayed a good contralto voice, and discharged the small duties allotted to her with infinite credit. Of so consummate an artist as Madame Trebelli-Bettini, we could say nothing but what we have so often written in her praise. Signor Mongini's fine voice gave strength, if not refinement, to the tenor department during a large portion of the season; and Signor Bettini, one of the most painstaking and conscientious members of the company, and Signor Gardoni, an old favorite, also lent most efficient aid to the general success of the season. Despite a certain hardness in the voice of Signor Perotti (the new tenor), there is much to admire in his singing; his execution of the trying music of Evik, in Wagner's Opera, being in many respects highly commendable. Signor Rinaldini, too, another new comer, made a highly favorable impression, as did also Signor Archinti in the little he had to do. Considering the claims of M. Faure to a prominent place throughout the season, it appears extraordinary how rarely he was heard. Why, for instance, was not "Don Giovanni" re-cast, instead of allowing his fine performance of the "Don" to be limited to one night because certain persons failed in some of the other characters? It is true that his Lotario, in Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," displayed his talent to the best advantage, but this work was played but seldom; and how many Operas could we name in which his co-operation would have proved a tower of strength! We would pass over the name of Mr. Santley with the usual recognition of the invaluable nature of his services, were we not compelled to record our unqualified admiration of his performance of the Holländer, in Wagner's Opera, a performance which not only stamped him as unquestionably the greatest baritone of the day; but proved beyond doubt that he had so earnestly studied the character as to invest it with that mysterious and supernatural coloring without which it would have merely taken its place as the conventional bass of the operatic stage. So intellectual a personation of a really difficult part is too rare to be dismissed without a special mark of recognition. Signori Verger and Raguer, considering the powerful basses and baritones already in the company, created a favorable impression, and probably may be made of more use next season. Signori Gassier, Foli, Castelli, Mr. Lyall, &c., may be briefly dismissed as too well known and efficient artists to need separate comment. So many of the Operas promised in the prospectus have been so faithfully produced, that we care only to mention one which was not—Cherubini's "Les deux Journées"—a work which we have long waited to hear in its perfect form; and, (considering that Mr. Santley was ready for the part of Michel, the water-carrier), one admirably adapted for the company. Let us hope that so welcome a revival is only delayed for one season. Meanwhile, we must thank the management for such revivals as Mozart's "L'Oca del Cairo," and Weber's "Abu Hassan;" and above all, for bravely venturing an Opera by that much abused, and much abusing composer, Wagner, whose unmeasured defiance of the critics, although no evidence of the possession of genius, is by no means a proof of his want of it. With a line of unqualified praise for the admirable manner in which Signor Arditì has conducted during the whole of the season, we must conclude our notice of Mr. Wood's first operatic campaign.

The concerts of the Philharmonic Society have thoroughly maintained their character in the instrumental department; but to ensure the appearance of a higher class of vocalists, we cannot help thinking that some definite arrangements should be made at the commencement of the season, so that names of eminence may be announced in the prospectus. There may be every disposition to engage well-known singers at each concert, but they are not to be procured at a few days' notice; and as second or third rate artists are constantly pressing for a hearing, there may be great danger of a still greater deterioration in the vocal department of the programmes, unless some such system as we have mentioned be adopted. Meanwhile, let us heartily praise the Directors for giving so excellent a final concert "in honor of Beethoven." Certainly, no Society had more right to represent the feeling of England on this occasion; for, apart from having been the means of introducing many of Beethoven's works to this country, it has immortalized itself by voluntarily giving substantial aid to the great composer in the hour of sickness and need.

The "New Philharmonic" Concerts, and the "Monday Popular" Concerts call for no particular notice, save a line of commendation on the efficient manner in which they have been conducted; and we may also say that the "Sacred Harmonic Society," by the production of Handel's much-neglected Oratorio, "Deborah," and the performance of a mutilated version of Beethoven's Mass in D, has at least shown a desire to introduce some novelty into their programmes.

Mr. Henry Leslie has given some very excellent concerts during the season, in which his choir has been the principal attraction—the performance of Mendelssohn's music to "Antigone," especially, being a success not easily forgotten—but we may also say that he has taken the field as a concert-giver on a more extensive scale, the principal singers from the Opera being engaged, and the fashionable, rather than the musical, portion of the London public being appealed to with a programme of Italian music, reminding us of the olden days of "Benefit Concerts." Oratorios, in which the principal parts have been sustained by Operatic vocalists, have also been given under Mr. Leslie's direction, which have attracted large audiences.

As we have already said, the two great works revived at the "Oratorio Concerts," have been really the most noteworthy events of the season. Beethoven's Grand Mass in D, and Bach's "Passion Music" have been shown to be not only perfectly intelligible to the performers, but equally intelligible to the listeners; and as we are certain that increased familiarity with these compositions will but deepen the impression which they have already made, we look forward with the utmost interest to their repetition. We must also mention the production of the Sacred Cantata, "Rebekah," written especially for these concerts by the conductor, Mr. Joseph Barnby, the success of which was so decisive, that it was selected for performance at the Hereford Festival. Whilst reviewing the series of "Oratorio Concerts" during the past season, it must in justice be said that the choir has made very decided progress both in quality of tone, and decision of attack; and when we consider that, in spite of the short time necessarily allowed for rehearsals, every promise in the prospectus has been rigidly redeemed, it may be readily imagined that a heart must have been thrown into the practice which materially lightens the labor of a conductor.

At the Crystal Palace, good instrumental works, well performed, have, as usual, ensured thoroughly appreciative audiences; and although perhaps the programmes have shown an undue leaning towards the modern German school, it is, no doubt, desirable that at least we should have a Musical Institution where novelty is admitted. We cannot forget what this establishment has done towards placing the name of Schubert amongst the great composers of the world; and provided we are not told in the books of words what we are to think of untried writers, we shall always be glad to hear what they have to say. When the choir, which certainly shows some signs of improvement, shall have been placed in as high a state of efficiency as the band, we shall hope to hear many great works which are too rarely presented in our concert-rooms in the metropolis.

The abolition of an orchestra in theatres exclusively devoted to the performance of the drama, sometime ago strenuously advocated in this journal, appears likely to be acted upon. At the Prince of Wales's Theatre, where all the latest refinements of stage arrangement are so effectively carried out, as a preliminary, we presume, to not hearing the instrumental performers, we have, during the last season, not been permitted to see them; and the bill of Mr. Hare's benefit, at the Princess's Theatre, announces that "there will be no orchestra," two musical friends having offered their services on the occasion. We know that "stage music" is often lugged in to heighten the effect of a "Sensation drama;" but if the abolition of the first should necessitate the abolition of the second, we need scarcely say that we shall be additionally grateful. As for the indifferent playing before and between the pieces, surely no intelligent member of an audience could desire the continuance of such a custom. A well-known Overture, effectually displaying the incapacity of the orchestra, can scarcely prepare the listeners for an elegant comedy; and when the curtain falls, the short interval for conversation or refreshment can hardly be enlivened by scraps from classical symphonies, or a common-place set of quadrilles.

In a record of the musical events of the year the honor voluntarily conferred upon Professor Sterndale Bennett by the University of Oxford, cannot be lightly passed over. So much has been said about musicians banding themselves together to raise the "status" of the English Professor, that we are glad when our theory can be practically proved that the "status" of a Professor depends entirely upon himself. Not only by his works, but by his unceasing devotion to the healthy progress of music in this country—involving sacrifices which only those intimately acquainted with him can ever know—has Professor Bennett worthily earned a distinction which, although in fact a recognition of the artist, is in effect a recognition of the art. Music in England is advancing but slowly to its true position; and as much can be done by its followers to urge its real claims upon the nation, we should be doubly thankful to those who, gifted by nature with a great power, devote that power to the highest and noblest purpose.

Beethoven, Goethe, and Michael Angelo.*

I recollect once seeing in the Pitti Palace at Florence a picture by Rubens, a magnificent, first-class painting: an "Allegory of War." Enflamed with rage, Mars is rushing out through the gates, flung wide apart, of the Temple of Janus; a wild Fury, waving a torch, is dragging him forward; Harpies are fluttering before him, and Europe (represented as Cybele with the mural crown) follows wringing her hands. It is in vain that the Goddess of Love, with flattering embraces, endeavors to hold him back. In his furious career, as God of War, he has thrown over several male figures, with the emblems of art and science in their hands, among them being a man with a lute. In the background there are all kinds of desolation and wretchedness. It is evident that Rubens painted the picture under the impression of the Thirty Years' War, then ravaging Germany with fire and sword. Late events brought this painting to my mind, and I thought to myself that the Beethoven Festival Committee, at Bonn, might very well borrow it from the Italian Government, and hang it up as a public excuse before the Festival Hall (just as theatrical managers in Germany have red bills posted at the street corners, when there is any sudden and unexpected change of performance); the man thrown down with the lute, and Mars rushing past him would render any further explanation superfluous. But war and the tumult of war shall not prevent us from reminding our readers that in December a century will have elapsed since one of the greatest German masters of the art of music was born—the master whom we are fond of naming with Mozart, just as we are fond of saying "Raphael and Michael Angelo," or "Schiller and Goethe," when we would allude, by two names, to the highest efforts in other branches of art. If, however, matters progress as they are now progressing at the seat of war, we may yet be able to leave Rubens's picture in Florence, and perform the Ninth Symphony with the "Te Deum" for victory and peace. God grant it may be so!

Of the bearers of the brilliant names I have just mentioned, the two great German poets, and the two great German composers, were contemporaries. Mozart and Schiller died at an early age, but fate permitted Beethoven to behold the countenance of his great predecessor, Mozart, who is said to have made on the occasion, the oft repeated remark: "Take care of him there; some day he, too, will have something to say." Goethe survived them all. He was, moreover, brought into personal communication with Beethoven, but, with regard to Mozart, we should scarcely be aware whether he ever knew of the existence of Schiller or Goethe, if he had not set to music Goethe's "Veilchen;" Heaven knows in what chance walk of his he found the lovely modest little flower, whose aromatic perfume delights us even at the present day. Don Carlos and Don Juan both belong to the same year (1787)—but could Mozart, in his Vienna, know aught about the former? It was not till a long time afterwards, when Mozart had long been in the realms of eternal harmonies, that the Vienna censure at length admitted Schiller's tragic muse into the imperial hereditary dominions. This appears rather strange to us, who have been nourished on Schiller's dramas, as on a sort of intellectual mother's milk; but let the reader put himself mentally in the place of a Vienna Censor of the Year One, and answer the question whether, when the worthy individual in question perused the Räuber, Kabale und Liebe, Fiesco, Don Carlos, Wallenstein, and Tell, his hair must not have stood on end, even supposing him to have worn a wig. When people spoke in Vienna at that period of German literature, they meant Klopstock and Wieland, who, like Alpha and Omega, like the two opposite poles, represented the "Elevated" and the "Gracful." That so joyous a mortal as Mozart should not be particularly impressed by Klopstock's elevated bombast is something very intelligible, and he made a most furious resistance when called upon to set to music the ode, "Calpe, dir donner't am Fuss," by a Viennese local Klopstock—Denis or Sined. The words were beautiful, anything you liked, but as for being fitted for music, such a thing was totally out of the question, he said. He was as little pleased with the pretty frivolities of Wieland; the latter, reversing the course pursued by the French who at the time possessed a French à la Grecque, had given the world Greek à la Française. Mozart was just as little edified by Wieland personally, as we learn from his Mannheim Letters.

Beethoven at first allowed himself to be talked into an admiration for Klopstock. What people in Vienna then thought of Klopstock is very amusingly shown by a picture of Abel's, to be found (if I am not mistaken) in the "new school" of the Belvidere, a copy by the artist himself being in the Picture Gallery at Prague: "Klopstock is introduced by Siona, clad in Vestal-like costume, and bearing in her hand a palm branch half a fathom long. He is welcomed by a group of Greek poets, with Homer at their head. 'I regret,' Homer appears to be saying, 'that I am acquainted with your admirable Messias only through the medium of a translation, as I do not understand German.' Dante stands some distance off, under laurel bushes, but he is perfectly penetrated with a sentiment of his own nothingness, and feels ashamed of his Divina Commedia, which must certainly have struck the wits of the Year One as a piece of barbarism. Near at hand sits Petrarch with his Laura.—The whole resembles a parody on Raphael's Parnassus, from which, indeed, the one Muse has been rather unceremoniously taken.

Beethoven, as he afterwards told Rochlitz, when the latter called upon him, was incessantly reading Klopstock's Odes. Who knows that he was not first excited to the Pastoral Symphony by the "Frühlingsfeier," which is really powerful and moving? When he became acquainted with Goethe's poems, he spoke no more about Klopstock. "He always began in D flat major—always from upwards downwards." What he thought of Schiller is proved by words with which, according to his first plan, he meant to introduce the final movement of the Ninth Symphony. "Let us sing the song of the immortal Schiller: 'Freude, schöne Götterfunken.'"

But Goethe probably was more highly prized by him. The highest and crowning task of his life struck him as being the composition of music to Frust; he wanted with this to conclude his artistic labors. His chorus, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," was dedicated by him to the author. Though this composition cannot, perhaps, be called one of his best, his melodies to some of Goethe's lyrical poems are so much the more magnificent: "Kennst du das Land?"—"Herz, mein Herz, was soll das geben?"—"Tröcknet nicht, Thränen der ewigen Liebe"—"Was zieht mir das Herz so?"—no man ever composed finer songs, not even Franz Schubert. The words and the tune are so blended that it is impossible to imagine them apart; it seems to us as though something is wanting if we accidentally come upon the verses alone when turning over an edition of Goethe's works. And, lastly, the music to Egmont! Kayser of Zurich (Goethe's composer-in-ordinary before Zelter came) composed, in Rome, where the poet had sent for him, some music for Egmont, which was just completed. In one of his letters, Goethe praises it as "very appropriate." This may have been the case, for we must confess that Beethoven's music to Egmont is "very inappropriate;" it appears to subordinate itself so modestly to the poetry; it appears to give in a mere sketchy form the situations that are musically rendered (for the reader compare with this Meyerbeer's intrusive show-music to his brother's Struensee); and yet—yet—with all respect for Egmont and the great poet, we must say that the music outshines the drama; the frame is, in this instance, finer than the picture, fine though the latter be.

Goethe appears to have been as deaf to all these beauties, intellectually, as the composer was physically. He made Beethoven's acquaintance at Teplitz, but appears to have been inwardly little impressed by Beethoven's intellectual grandeur. We may say: without even having a suspicion of Beethoven's greatness, he beheld in the composer scarcely aught else than a man with whom it was difficult to keep up a communication, in consequence of his deafness, and who, from his bristling roughness and melancholy pining, was but slightly sympathetic. To Bettina's enthusiastic epistle Goethe answered, "cool to his inmost heart;"—with a gracious nod, and half depreciatingly he admits, "Beethoven's talent, which will show him the right way." When young Mendelssohn played him the first piece of the C minor Symphony upon the piano, the old gentleman evidently did not feel at all comfortable. "That is music which would cause the roof to fall in if performed by the whole orchestra at once, he muttered.

Though taking the purest and deepest interest in plastic art and in music, nay, more, though perfectly capable of appreciating both most thoroughly, Goethe unfortunately had as advisers by his side medio critics like Heinrich Meyer and Zelter. To what a degree his immeasurably larger mind believingly submitted to the guidance is strikingly proved, for instance, by his allowing Zelter graciously to accord him Sebastian Bach's music. He would certainly have been able to comprehend Beethoven's music ten times better! The "Sonata Pathétique" was, at any rate, something which could penetrate ten times more confidentially to his heart than the Chromatic Fantasia. After Goethe had become acquainted in Upper Italy with Palladio, and in Venice with all sorts of specimens of the Antique, he solemnly renounced the Gothic principle, and himself threw down the monument that he had erected, "diis manibus Errini a Steinbach." But the Gothic, or rather that Christian, and, at the same time, profoundly and significantly mysterious principle of art, organically constructing to the sharpest sense the principle which created the "frozen music" of the Gothic style of architecture, melted and was dissolved in the "thawed architecture" of Bach's Preludes, Toccatas, Fugues, and Fantasias, while the "heathen" Goethe knelt believingly before these revelations, or rather, "he went to bed, and let the organist, von Berks, play him Sebastian." Zelter praised this highly: "So be it; he must be overheard, as it were, by an eavesdropper!" According to this rule, when "Sebastian" are for the future announced in the programme, the public will do well to run directly out of the room and listen at the key-hole, not to hear (according to the proverb) their own shame, but Sebastian's glory.

In the correspondence between Goethe and Zelter frequent mention is made of Beethoven. Zelter speaks of him in pretty much the same way that a blind man, hearing a peal of bells, would calculate the height of the steeple in which they hang. On one occasion, he even says: "We might, perhaps, compare Beethoven, at a distance, to Michael Angelo." That was a great thing to say to Goethe. For Goethe wrote from Rome after seeing the frescoes of the Sixtine Chapel: "I am at this moment so captivated by Michael Angelo, that not even Nature pleases me after him, for I cannot see with such great eyes as he does. (Parenthetically remarked, it is a strange fact that Goethe never says a syllable anywhere of the Moses or Medici Digger, &c., &c.) Zelter hazarded the comparison, but only timidly; he places Beethoven at his proper "distance," that is, considerably under the great Florentine. We, having clearly before our eyes all Beethoven did, and knowing all his importance, shall not think Michael Angelo's truly Titanic mind less, but we consider what he created as analogous to only one side of Beethoven's labors. When parallels have been drawn between Mozart and Raphael—Rochlitz began it, and was followed by von Henel, Ulrici, and Alberti—there is a great temptation to play the Platarch between Michael Angelo and Beethoven, and placing them back to back, as we sometimes place Jack and Gill, to see which is the taller of the two. Such comparisons are, in reality, not worth much, they are games of wit rather than aught else, with which superficiality pays itself court. For instance, Rochlitz, who had certainly seen nothing of Raphael beyond the Dresden Madonna, could not possibly possess a correct standard by which to judge the master. When, therefore, we see such points adduced as: each died young; each left his last and most highly prized work unfinished, and it had to be completed by the hands of novices, &c., &c., such silly nonsense having nothing to do with the essential attributes of the masters—we look about to see whether we are not also informed that: "Both were exceedingly fond of such and such a dish." With regard, however, to Beethoven and Michael Angelo, the idea of employing the one to explain the other, recurs in the writings of exceedingly able critics, such as Lübke and Hermann Grimm, and we may as well have a glance at it.

Birmingham Festival.

[Concluded from the Orchestra.]

The evening concert of Thursday was well attended, a great degree of interest being felt in the production of Ferdinand Hiller's cantata entitled "Nala and Damayanti." The high position held by the composer in Germany, and the strength of his reputation among our own musical men, many of whom are his personal friends, were sufficient to arouse this interest and to justify the curiosity to see how Dr. Hiller's work would be received in England.

[Here follows an analysis of the libretto, which we have already copied from another source.]

The musical working out of the above theme is as favorable a specimen of the German progressive school as could be obtained. It is marked by originality of idea, elaboration of effects, great capacity for contrasts, breadth of conception, and delicacy of workmanship. Occasionally the sentiment rises to intensity: nowhere is it commonplace and nowhere are the parts contemptible for their ease. On the contrary, the cantata presents difficulties which it was the artists' victory to have overcome. Miss Wynne, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, who were the principal singers, did admirably. Miss Wynne, indeed, gained a wealth of commendation for the remarkable entrain with which she assailed her task. Her singing of Damayanti was exalted, impassioned, fine: and Dr. Hiller, who conducted the work, led her gratefully on to share with him the honors of his reception after the performance. Mr. Cummings and Mr. Santley also acquitted themselves to universal satisfaction. The applause greeting the composer was loud and prolonged.

The great feature of the Festival was reserved till Friday, when Mr. Benedict's new oratorio, "Saint Peter," was performed. To enter upon the claim which Mr. Benedict can put forth for consideration as a representative master-musician of the time would only be to recapitulate what everybody has accepted long ago, and from which no dissident could be found. By work carried on among us for many years he has gained a high and undisputed position. He carries the credentials of a pupilage under Weber; but his best credentials are his own activity. Chamber music, orchestral compositions, and operas of a high musicianly stamp have established his title; and these results of what may be called his home work—compositions of the study and chimney-corner—have been supplemented by indefatigable and interminable outdoor work: endless assistance at concerts and festivals and private gatherings, labor from which, were it high or low, pompous or homely, Benedict was never known to shrink, if only the appeal was made. Strange to say—though perhaps a reason may be found in his enormous and unrelenting occupation—Mr. Benedict had hitherto abstained from attempting the highest field—sacred composition. This he has reserved for his maturity. Four years ago he made his first essay in the sacred drama, and in the "Legend of Saint Cecilia" demonstrated perfect qualifications. Rendered confident by the reception of that work and the universal recognition it attained, he has now taken rank among the masters of oratorio by virtue of a really great work—"St. Peter."

The groundwork on which Mr. Benedict builds is not entirely dramatic. It is rather didactic, and does not thrust the hero prominently into the foreground. In fact, as Mendelssohn's aid, the difficulty in treating such a subject historically lies in the fact that Christ occupies the central place in Peter's earlier life, and the Master would necessarily displace the disciple. The method in which Mr. Benedict has handled the subject is thus analyzed:

"The Divine Call; Galilean fishermen are preparing to rest from the labors of the day, when John the Baptist appears, urging them to 'Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand.' After the forerunner comes the Master, who commands Peter to leave all and follow Him. Peter obeys, expressing his firm confidence in the goodness of the Lord, and departs amid the benedictions of his friends and neighbors.—Trial of Faith; The Saviour having sent His disciples to 'the other side,' retires to a mountain apart to pray. While thus engaged the storm rises and the little ship is in distress. Jesus appears walking on the waters, to the terror of his disciples, whom He speedily re-assures, bidding them not to fear. Peter obtains permission to leave the ship and go to Jesus; but his faith fails him, and 'beginning to sink,' he is sustained by the hand of his Lord. They reach the ship and immediately the storm ceases. A chorus of praise and thanksgiving then brings the first part to an end.—Denial: Peter declares his resolve to follow the Master at all hazards, but when Jesus is taken before the high priest the disciple is found 'afar off.' He enters the servants' hall of the high priest's palace, where a crowd of attendants are expressing their hatred of the 'Nazarene,' and Peter is three times charged with being a follower of Jesus. Three times he denies the accusation.—Repentance: The procession escorting Jesus to the Roman governor passes through the hall where Peter is, and the Lord turns and looks on His erring disciple. Touched to the heart, Peter repents 'with strong crying and tears,' the anguish of his soul being heightened by each successive scene of the great drama which then passes before him. He hears the lamentations of fellow-disciples, and the mournful song of his Lord's mother; he watches the procession to Calvary, and listens to the taunts of the Jews as they mingle with the wailing of the 'daughters of Jerusalem.' Weeping 'for all these things' and for himself, the hope of the Christian comes to his aid, and he is assured that death will be swallowed up in victory.—Deliverance: Peter lying in the dungeon where Herod had thrown him, is visited by angels, who assure him of Divine help, and release him from captivity. He acknowledges the goodness of God, fully relying upon which he expresses confidence as to his ultimate entrance into the everlasting kingdom of his Lord and Saviour. Rejoining his fellow-believers he is received with gladness, and a song of hope and joy forms the conclusion of the work."

The oratorio opens with an overture descriptive of evening by the Sea of Galilee—calm, placid, typical, with admirable orchestral undertones suggestive of the rippling of the waters. The first chorus, "They that go down to the sea in ships," opened by the basses, is a skillfully constructed and captivating moderato in six-eight time, and in the key of E flat. On the words "these behold the works of the Lord," both the key and the subject change, and a bolder strain, with simple chord accompaniment, is introduced. At the words "the Lord will preserve their going out," the chorus effectively changes its character, being sung only by sopranos and altos, and a further change in key and time takes place at the words "We will lie down in peace;" but the chorus concludes with the same motive which commenced it. A few chords for the wind instruments usher in the tenor voice, calling upon the people in the language of John the Baptist, to "repent, for the kingdom of Heaven is at hand." The chorus reply in agitated fashion, and the Baptist urges his mission with tremolo accompaniment. The tenor solo here, "O House of Jacob," was magnificently sung by Mr. Sims Reeves. The text, "He will teach us of His ways, for out of Zion shall go forth the Law and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem," is set to a very pleasing melody in triple time, in the key of G, commencing in pianissimo, and gradually increases in power and intensity, until the words are reached "For out of Zion shall go forth the law," delivered in detached phrases, intersected by bold staccato chords, when the original time is resumed, and the air ends pianissimo. A following chorus has some excellent four-part writing, contrasted with florid violin passages in the accompaniments. A chief gem of the work is that which follows, descriptive of the calling of Peter. It commences with a recitative, "And Jesus walking by the sea of Galilee," followed by a dignified baritone air in B flat, opening with sustained chords for the brass, "How great, O Lord," which in its turn succeeded by a delightful chorus, "The Lord be a lamp," melodious and hymnal in character. Hereon follows the "Trial by Faith." The Evening Prayer at sea and rising of the storm comprise a highly effective scene. It opens pianissimo in the key of E, with short tranquil phrases for the violins con sordini and in unison, then after some skilful modulations, gradually increases in breadth and power, with epical phrases for the flutes and oboes, suggestive of the rising wind, culminating finally in the grand chorus in 12 8 time, led by the basses, "The deep uttereth his voice and lifteth his hands on high," in the accompaniment of which the other resources of the orchestra are reinforced by drums and cymbals. The helplessness of the sailors at the mercy of the storm is graphically shown in this writing. The soprano air and chorus, "The Lord hath His way in the whirlwind," the soprano part admirably sung by Mlle. Tietjens, has a grand and striking theme. It increased in intensity until the solo voice was heard soaring above hand and chorus, producing a marvelous impression. Then a short contralto recitative, "And in the fourth watch of the night," introduces the scene of the apparition of Jesus walking on the waters, and the incident of the sinking of St. Peter. In this scene one of the most striking numbers is a dramatic and mystically colored chorus for male voices, "It is a spirit," opening with alternate phrases for the tenors and basses, in the key of C sharp minor. Peter's gratitude for his rescue is expressed in a baritone air in G minor, with staccato accompaniment, "Now know I that the Lord saveth His anointed," and a contralto recitative, introduced by a very charming prelude, but itself chiefly unaccompanied, announces in antique church tones the subsistence of the storm. A chorus, "O come let us sing unto the Lord," was encored on Friday; and the next chorus, "Praise ye the Lord," exhibiting Mr. Benedict's contrapuntal skill in the boldness of the harmonies, and the scholarly fugue, brings the first part to a successful conclusion.

The second part, comprising Denial, Repentance, and Deliverance, commences the illustration of the first section with Peter's assurance, confided to the baritone voice: "Though all men shall be offended," the music of which is wholly in keeping with the confident spirit. The comment on the above text follows in a chorus, "They all forsook him and fled," and we come to what is one of the highest successes of the work, a contralto air, "O thou afflicted and tossed by the tempest," sung by Mlle. Patey; the effect was irresistibly touching and exquisite. The final denial of Christ follows, and the angelic rebuke: "How art thou fallen, O son of the morning," which is curiously out of character with the sentiment, for the music is absolutely joyous. The pathos, however, is supplied in the tenor, "The Lord is very pitiful," after the second and third denial of the Saviour; which Mr. Sims Reeves touchingly sang. Christ being led to the judgment-hall, the air which immediately follows is supposed to be sung by Peter, "Oh, that my head were waters." It is full of passionate anguish and contrite sorrow, and is the best baritone air in the oratorio. Omitting a gloomy chorus, a dead march, and we come to a double chorus for disciples and Jews, the great and original effect of which lies in a contrast of band accompaniment with organ, each illustrating the opposing sentiments of Hebrew persecution and Christian mourners. A soprano solo, "I mourn as a dove," is an exquisitely touching melody in A major, with flowing accompaniment, which, sung by Mlle. Tietjens, was encored. The remaining effect lay in another pathetic tenor air, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me;" a grand eight-part chorus, in triple time, allegro maestoso, "He will swallow up death;" a stirring bravura, in E flat, for soprano, "Gird up thy loins and arise;" a chorus of angels, with harp accompaniment, "Fear thou not, for the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand;" another fine baritone air, of a jubilant character, "The Lord hath sent His angel, and delivered me;" and the grand final fugal chorus, "Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of His," which, skilfully wrought, is a noble number and worthily concludes the oratorio. The verdict passed upon the work as a whole was unanimously flattering to its composer. On the conclusion, loud and long-continued cheering, accompanied by clapping of hands and waving of handkerchiefs, broke out in all parts of the Hall—the band and chorus joining in the demonstration. Mr. Benedict again and again bowed his acknowledgements, but it was some time before the public would allow him to escape their well-merited congratulations on the success of his really fine oratorio. For us it remains in chronicling the production of an able and conscientious musician to record the plaudits which on Friday were so freely bestowed.

After a short interval, Mozart's "Requiem" was proceeded with, the solo parts devolving on Mlle. Lima di Murska, Mlle. Drasdil, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli. The performance was worthy of the music. Band and chorus, under Costa's leading, were admirable, and the vocal principals were all in excellent voice, and sung with great spirit and precision.

The audience at the evening performance was quite equal in point of numbers to that of the morning. The concert was entirely given up to the execution of Handel's oratorio, "Samson," the solo parts of which were taken by Mlle. Tietjens. Mlle. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, Sig. Foli, and Mr. Cummings. The great successes of the evening were accomplished by Mr. Sims Reeves in "Total eclipse," by Mlle. Patey in "Return, O God of Hosts," and by the chorus in "Fixed in his everlasting seat." This last chorus by the bye is stated by a Daily critic to have been utterly ruined by the slow time in which Sir Michael Costa took it. Sir Michael Costa's time, we take it, is Handel's time: so well known traditionally in the case in question that an octogenarian chorus-singer of the "London Concerts" and the smallest cathedral choir-boy would agree in the tempo. We should be glad to have the critic's view in metronomic formula, or perhaps at the next Festival he will undertake to conduct it.

The following figures show that, like Hereford, the Birmingham Festival this year in financial respects exhibits that law of decline on which we commented a week ago.

	1864.			1867			1870.
Receipts.	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.
Tuesday	2135	3	4	2684	11	7	4630	8	0

	£12,562	1	6	£13,270	9	8	£12,356	17	6

From the above statement it will be seen that the receipts of the Festival of 1870 have fallen short both of those of 1867 and 1864.

Mr. Benedict's "St. Peter."

MR. CHORLEY, whilome musical critic of the London Athenæum, writes as follows to the Musical World:

During thirty-five years of rather busy life as a journalist, and attempting original composition, I have, on principle, avoided obtruding my own personality on the public. It is with no common reluctance, then, that, at the eleventh hour of my career, I feel myself obliged to state a case which concerns every literary man who writes for music.

I have always held that, in an oratorio, no intermixture of secular words with those from Holy Writ was in accordance with reverence or good taste. The two greatest works of the kind existing—the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt"—were constructed on this principle. I have never been able to comprehend how any one could venture to dilute or eke out the text of the Bible, or to acquiesce in the introduction of verses from the Psalter or Hymn Book into Scriptural stories, such as occurs in the oratorios of Sebastian Bach—unless, indeed, these be performed according to their author's intention, that is, with the audience joining in, congregationally. The admirers of Mendelssohn, who admit no fault in his judgment, will be displeased at my saying that the objection applies in yet fuller force to his "St. Paul"—because there no such assistance on the part of "the people" was contemplated. Be these wire-drawn scruples, or convictions worthy of consideration, I have acted on them whenever I have attempted to arrange a Biblical subject for music; as in the book of my friend Mr. H. Leslie's "Judith," and with greater care and pains, because on a more extended scale, when I treated the story of St. Peter.

This was the work to have been performed at the late Birmingham Festival; and my completed book, having been submitted to and accepted by the committee, was handed over to Mr. Benedict, who had been selected to compose the new oratorio for the year 1870, early in the last year. Mr. Benedict, both personally and in writing, expressed himself (to speak moderately) entirely satisfied with what was set before him; and thus not only to myself, but to other persons. It was further expressly agreed on, in terms of the most perfect amity, that no alterations or modifications of the text were to be made save by myself. It was subsequently suggested by me that, should time fall short, only the first two parts of the oratorio should be performed at this year's Festival.

The past year went on, and I heard not a word of the oratorio, which was to be delivered for rehearsal at Birmingham on the 1st of March, 1870. I returned to London permanently, after occasional absences (always within reach of recall), on the 16th of October, 1869. Becoming curious, not to say anxious, with regard to a work of extent and pretension, suggested by myself, and in which I had expended some research and contrivance, I wrote to Mr. Benedict, on the 15th of November, to inquire how matters were proceeding; announcing that I intended to be absent from England for two months of the early spring of this year, and that I was anxious to leave nothing incomplete or requiring reconsideration. On the 10th of last January I learned, for the first time, that Mr. Benedict (who had answered my note) had shown portions of the music of "St. Peter" to more than one person, and that he had disposed of the oratorio to a publisher. In reply to my request for an explanation of conduct so strangely savoring of contempt to myself, I was favored, on the 15th of January, with direct information from Mr. Benedict, that he had thought fit to make changes, omissions, and additions in my book, which had been accepted by him unconditionally, and with regard to which he had not up to that time uttered a syllable of objection, or remonstrance. He informed me that he had made these alterations by aid of a concordance. While I distinctly refused, by the slightest connivance, to sanction so amazing a transaction, the full impertinence of which was, even then, unknown to me, my intention was to keep silence with regard to it. I felt that every possible deference was due to the committee of the Birmingham Festival, in recognition of their known services to art, and in gratitude for their private and liberal hospitality. But seeing that I received after-communications on the subject from Mr. Benedict, not so much explanatory as aggressive, I have decided that it behoves me to lay the matter before the public; the more so, since I have only very recently learnt that Mr. Benedict had absolutely, before the oratorio was sold, thought proper to call in, not merely a "concordance," but the assistance of a gentleman who consented to accept the strange task of remodelling another man's productions. I have purposely foreborne speaking out till the present moment, not wishing to damage a new work by the statement of such a case of flagrant injustice and discourtesy; this, however, out of no consideration to the composer. To myself the affront is one of small consequence; I have written enough for musical purposes to give the public a fair impression of such power, greater or less, as I may possess. But the cause is the cause of all younger (and I hope better) men who may come after me, and to whom it may be of immediate importance that they should not be first cajoled and flattered, and subsequently ignored and insulted, by persons pretending to hold a place in the rank of artists. A. F. CHORLEY.

Ferdinand Hiller.

Ferdinand Hiller, pianist and composer, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, on the 24th October, 1811, and is consequently, in his 59th year. While still a child, the great talent he exhibited for music already determined his vocation, and no pains were spared to perfect his musical education under Hoffmann, the imaginative composer of music, A. Schmidt, the great contrapuntist, Vollweiler, and subsequently Hummel, Mozart's favorite pupil, with whom young Hiller spent two years in Weimar. He was not ten years old when he made his first public appearance as a pianist, and in his 17th year he published at Vienna his first composition—a quartet for piano and strings. The subsequent fertility of the young composer is shown by the fact that the opus number of his new cantata, produced at the Birmingham Festival on Thursday evening, is 150. On the completion of his musical apprenticeship Ferdinand Hiller spent no less than seven years in Paris, where he devoted himself chiefly to classical music, and especially to the study of Bach and Beethoven. In the winter of 1836-37 returning to his native town he was appointed director of the Orchestra of the Frankfort Cœcilien Verein. His next move was to Milan, where his successful opera of Romilda was produced. The winter of 1839-40 found him at Leipzig, where he produced his oratorio, The Destruction of Jerusalem, which deservedly ranks as one of his best and most successful works. Returning to Italy, he married there in the summer of 1841, since which time he has lived in turn at Dresden, Frankfort, and Leipzig, in which latter town he directed the famous Gewandhaus Concerts, in the winter of 1843-44. Dr. Hiller afterwards spent four years in Dresden, where he brought out his two operas, Der Traum in der Christnacht (The Dream in the Night of the Nativity), in 1844, and Coradin der letzte Hohenstaufen (Coradin, the last Rose of the Hohenstaufen), in 1847. In the same year he accepted the office of music director at Düsseldorf, where he remained three years, removing thence, in 1850, to Cologne, where he was invited to undertake the office of Capellmeister. Here, the already existing Concert Institute flourished greatly under his vigorous management, where, also, he founded the Rhenish Music School. In the year of 1851-2 he went to Paris, where he directed the Italian Opera. He passed the following spring in London, and returned in November of the same year to Cologne, where he has since constantly resided, with the exception of occasional journeys, of which the last was to Russia.

Of his numerous compositions, the most notable, besides those incidentally mentioned above, are his various collections of songs—especially the drei Bücher neue Gesänge—some pianoforte sonatas, two concertos for the same instrument, several excellent studies for the violin and piano, impromptus, rhythmical studies, an operetta without words, a quatre mains, and of vocal pieces for solo, chorus and orchestra, the "Gesang den Geister über dem Wasser" ("Song of the spirits above the water") and "O weint um sie" ("Oh weep for her"), after Byron; "The Night of the Nativity," "Heloise," the Loreley, "Night," "The morning of Palm Sunday," the "93rd Psalm," and "Whitsuntide," may be cited as the most important. His great choral works are: The Destruction of Jerusalem, already mentioned in the oratorios, Ver sacrum and Saul, and the opera, Die Katakomben (The Catacombs). Among his instrumental compositions his Symphony in E flat is especially good.—Musical World.

A Musical Tour in North Germany.

BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.—No. 2.

(From the London Choir.)

AFTER attending the opera and the concert in "Kroll's" Gardens, I paid brief visits to some of the minor theatres and higher class concert halls, which were all filled with large audiences, listening intently and with much evident enjoyment to the varied music performed by the excellent bands I always found in such places.

Professor Haupt was true to his appointment at 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning, July 5th, at the parish church, of which, with the exception of a single mutual friend, and the inevitable bellows-blowers, we were then the sole occupants. To my great surprise, this noted organist politely but firmly insisted upon my trying the qualities of the instrument before he himself displayed them. This unusual proceeding was afterwards explained to me as being his usual plan for testing a man, for finding that his time had been too often wasted upon men whose acquaintance with music and organs was very limited, and who generally mistook enthusiasm for knowledge, the Professor was compelled to adopt some scheme, whereby he might be enabled to judge of his visitors' musical capabilities. After complying with the request and playing for a short time, the rightful owner of the organist's seat took his place, and for one hour greatly delighted me with his performance on the instrument. The selection comprised Bach's grand Prelude and Fugue in B minor; Louis Thiele's air and elaborate variations in A flat; some variations of his own on a chorale; and a short improvisation. The salient features of his playing were more especially exhibited in the Fugue of Bach's, played as it was with remarkable dignity and grandeur of style—at a speed, too, considerably slower than that usually adopted by the majority of modern English organists. Never, indeed, much of Sebastian Bach's organ music as I have heard played by the most noted English organists, did I enjoy the music of the grand old Leipzig cantor so thoroughly; never did I hear this stupendous creation of his fertile brain developed with a more masterly appreciation of its varied beauties, subtle harmonies, and erudite phrasing. It was a treat to me of the highest order, and it will never leave my memory. The composition of Louis Thiele, a young Berlin organist and composer, who died in 1848, at the early age of 32, and whose compositions for the instrument are regarded, and it appears to me justly regarded, as the finest, withal the most difficult, organ music produced since the days of John Sebastian himself, afforded Professor Haupt a good opportunity of displaying his undoubted ability as a facile pedallist, the variations being replete with difficulties. To those who are desirous of getting some rather startling and novel original organ compositions, I would recommend the five or six works by this composer, which are published by Schlesinger, the well-known music and book-seller of Berlin, and edited by Professor Haupt.

The organ being deficient in nearly all modern mechanical appliances, in consequence of which variety of tone could only be obtained by changing the stops separately with the hands, the pauses between some of the variations were necessarily long and certainly not at all to the advantage of the effect of the composition, or the exposition of its continuity of thought and purpose.

The Professor having expressed a desire to hear some English organ music, of which he confessed he knew nothing whatever, I gratified his wish, and he seemed to be most particularly pleased with a Postlude in C major of Mr. Henry Smart's, which appeared in the first number of the Organist's Quarterly

Journal. When I explained the size, power, and character of the great organ in the Town Hall at Leeds, the facilities afforded to the performer by its superior mechanism, and, especially, the hydraulic engines, which work the bellows, thus dispensing with the three or four men on whom a German organist is still dependent, the warmest admiration was elicited from Professor Haupt, and a signification of his intention, notwithstanding his advanced age (he is sixty, but looks much younger) to make great efforts to come over to England and hear an organ of such magnitude and fine construction. Subsequently, in the course of a long and interesting conversation with this distinguished organist, he told me he had been informed that the leading public organists, in England were in the habit of playing overtures on an instrument which he deemed unfitted for the production of such a class of music. "Was it really so?" "Certainly," I replied, "for our modern organs in the large concert halls are constructed with a view to the performance of orchestral and chamber music; but in our churches the leading organists are especially particular in choosing the styles of composition suitable for the sacred place and the solemn services in which they are regarded." "I am glad," said the Professor, "to hear your explanation, as I had labored under the impression from what I had been told that you played overtures in your churches during or at the conclusion of divine service; but let me ask you," he added, "how and by whom are these public organ services that you speak of organized and carried on?"

"By the Municipal authorities in our large towns of Liverpool, Leeds, and Newcastle; the audiences have to pay a small sum for admission to the performances, which generally take place twice every week." This piece of news surprised my friend greatly, who eagerly remarked upon the peculiar difficulty which an organist must have in gratifying people of such diverse tastes, who moreover had to pay for what they heard, a fact which he seemed to think would tend to make them hypercritical. Upon asking how, if he had a similar object to accomplish, he would contrive to interest miscellaneous audiences when the organ repertoires of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and other masters, were exhausted, he told me how he had been persuaded by the pastor of his Church, a proficient amateur, to give some performances of classical music; the first was attended by great numbers of people, many of whom loaded him with congratulations and praises for the success of his efforts; but at the second performance, when a small charge was made for admission by the direction of the pastor, who considered that the organist ought to receive some remuneration for the valuable time which he had been so willing to give up to the detriment of other pressing arrangements, there were not more than two dozen persons present.

This effectually put an end to all performances of a similar description, even at nominal prices, in Berlin, and affords another instance, if any be required, of the impossibility of attracting large numbers of people even in musical Germany, by organ music unvaried by any other of a more popular character, though the price of admission is a mere trifle. After he had expressed his intention of sending an early contribution to the Organist's Quarterly Journal, I parted with this remarkable musician, as much impressed by his simple but earnest manner and conversation as I had been by his undoubted powers as an organist à première force.

On the afternoon of the same day I accompanied a friend to hear the usual weekly rehearsal of the members of the celebrated Berlin Singing Academy. It was a most interesting gathering of about eighty singers; there seemed to be about twenty-four sopranos, twenty altos (all females), sixteen tenors, and sixteen basses. They were conducted by Professor Groll, Herr Blumner presiding at the piano. The programme included:

Choral (from a Motet).....J. S. Bach.
"Sancta Maria".....Hollwig.
Motet, ending with Choral "Der Hirte Israel."

J. S. Bach.
Mass, "Lob, sang am Schöpfung's Morgen".....Reichard.

The tone of the bass voices was remarkably good and sonorous, the lower notes even as low as double D being sung with perfect clearness of intonation; but the other sections did not appear to me to equal corresponding voices of well trained choirs in our own country. The discipline and order, however, of the whole affair cannot be too highly commended to the notice of similar societies at home. Members, as they entered the orchestra, first politely saluted the conductor, then the pianist, and quickly took their allotted seats, where their copies were found arranged in the order of practice. No talking or annoying noises were allowed in any part of the room during the performance of a piece, and the few of the audience who happened to arrive late exhibited that respect, which all Germans seem to entertain, for the art, and showed their indisposition to mar the enjoyment of others by gently and cautiously moving on tip-toe as short a distance as possible. All the choir stood whilst singing, but whenever any part had several bars rest, those, whose voices were not needed sat down, and at a glance of the conductor's eye, who was always ready to give the signal, rose en masse with military precision just before the commencement of their part. This perhaps arises in some measure from their military education, for the humblest classes never pass each other in the street without salutes. Nor was the choir deficient in solo singers, some of whom sang at sight (as I was informed) the solos in Bach's Motet, and in the Mass, with remarkable correctness and considerable style and expression. It must be remembered, however, that each of these singers could play either the piano-forte or some other instrument, which they had studied from early youth; for it is an indispensable part of the education of both sexes in Germany; so they all become musicians and critics of more or less efficiency and excellence.

Before quitting the Prussian metropolis, I must just mention en passant that amongst the curiosities of the world-renowned "Royal Museum," with its magnificent frescoes representing the labors of Hercules and the exploits of Theseus, are preserved with the most religious care two flutes—one silver, the other wood—with which Frederick the Great was wont to divert himself when he wanted relaxation from the more serious cares of State. Whilst looking at these relics I could not help recalling to my memory the anecdotes told by Forkel of Sebastian Bach's visit to the great Prussian monarch in the company of his son William Friedemann. . . .

One of the largest of modern built organs in North Germany is that in the church of S. Thomas, Berlin, built by W. Sauer, of Frankfort on the Oder. The following "disposition" of this fine instrument will be regarded with interest by many:—

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 8, 1870.

Theodore Thomas's Concerts.

On Tuesday evening (Oct. 4) the ways to our Music Hall were thronged again—after the summer drought and dearth of music—with people eager to be present at the opening of the promised fortnight's feast. It was the first great concert of a season which will abound in such. Mr. Thomas's noble orchestra were there in full force, nearly sixty instruments, and were warmly welcomed with their leader. There were some new faces among them, but the band had not lost its identity at all, the more important places being filled by the same men as before, except that the leading violin of last year had changed places with one of his colleagues, and that we missed Mr. Bergner in the row of cellists; admirable ones remained however, five of them, blending their rich tones into one. Also the capital oboist, Mr. Eller, was supplemented by a new second of superior quality. Nothing of the old drill,—the perfect tune, the precision of time and accent, the sonorous, rich ensemble, the keen, searching, vital quality of violin tone, the marked and well tempered individuality of the other instruments, the sympathetic unity and spirit and fine light and shade of the whole rendering—was lost; it was the Thomas orchestra, unique and admirable. And with what zest one was prepared to drink in the sounds!

The programme was much better than the average during Thomas's last visit here. Of the four first and largest pieces three were classical and well known here, while the fourth was of the least extravagant and most poetic strains of Wagner, and fresh to all ears, though it had been played here many years since. These alone were matter enough for a rich concert; all that could have been further asked would be that one piece should be a Symphony. The lighter miscellany of the last part was simply light—for the most part graceful, sometimes sentimental—but never offensively noisy; even the trombone Concerto "roared as gently as any nightingale," and Meyerbeer with stunning Fackelzug was not there to craze us. A better programme for Mr. Thomas's purpose, which is to conciliate the "classical taste" for which our city, rightly or wrongly, seems to have the credit, while making daily concerts profitable by catering miscellaneous to all comers,—could hardly have been devised. This purpose is not to be confounded with that of certain other series of concerts, permanently organized in most great cities, to insure opportunities, at stated intervals throughout the year or season, of keeping up acquaintance with the highest, purest kind of instrumental music, works of the great masters mainly, with only such more novel things as bind up fitly into the same bouquet or programme; for without such occasions the Art idea as such, would be lost, since Art knows nothing miscellaneous. With these two things: (1) a stated series of "Symphony Concerts" relying mainly on artistic principle and purity of programme, making their direct appeal always to a tried and loyal audience, which is certain by this means to grow continually in numbers; and (2) such feasts (almost surfeits) as Mr. Thomas several times has given us of ten or a dozen concerts in a fortnight, to quicken our ideal of orchestral execution, where performance does not lag behind conception (as has been and may yet be too long the case with our own local orchestras without the stimulus of such example)—as well as to give us glimpses into the newer fashions (so to speak) of music, and instances of splendid execution and effect in music mainly written for that purpose:—with these two things, Boston is certainly well provided in the matter of orchestral music. The former is the normal education to fit us for a just appreciation of the latter; while, without the one, the other by the mingling of so much of the sensational and transitory with the true and the enduring, would mislead, confuse, prevent the uniformed taste from settling into any really artistic, sound direction.

Tuesday's concert opened with Weber's brilliant Overture to Euryanthe, so well known as an opening overture in many of our concerts before now. Nothing could be better to seize and captivate the sense at once; and the swift, searching chords of the beginning never seemed so full of life and fire as they did now, waked by this perfect orchestra, saluting us after so long abstinence. The sweet and mellow horn strain, full of feeling, into which that outburst of enthusiasm subsides; then the mysterious pianissimo with muted strings (the ghost scene of the opera); then the fugued passage, which seems fraught with earnest, half hushed conference upon some exciting matter; and finally the return of the heroic, fiery allegro,—all were listened to with breathless interest, till the enthusiasm could break out in loud applause.

In nothing did the sympathy and thorough discipline of the whole orchestra show itself more finely than in the accompaniment (not the right word to use in such a case, if only we had another) to Schumann's Concerto in A minor, of which Miss ANNA MENDEL played the piano part,—admirably, of course, as she plays everything. The fine, poetic vitality with which the whole work is instinct, was sure to be felt with such an interpreter.

Next came the Vorspiel or Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," which is a long breath of straggly mingled and mysterious harmony, one long crescendo from thin, aerial violin tones, shrilling at their highest height, through ever lower, broader, fuller harmonies, with richer coloring, to an immense fortissimo, as if the wonder, that first gleamed on the far horizon, had gradually approached the breathless spectator, widening, deepening as it spreads along, until it is now right upon him; then after a brief while it recedes again and ends in the aerial, high tones with which it began. This is Wagner's way of foreshadowing in a brief instrumental picture the supernatural arrival and departure of the Swan from over the sea bearing the Knight of the Holy Grail, on which the whole plot of his opera turns. One who knows the opera will feel it to be a very poetic and suggestive, as well as unique prelude. The crescendo, from the thin, piercing high sounds through descending, ever broader harmonies, is a true type in music of the idea of distance and increasing nearness. But that such experiments are dangerous is shown by the impressions got by persons unacquainted with the opera; witness the ingenious criticism in one of the newspapers the next morning, which tells us that "it begins with a long-drawn wail, or rather shriek, from the violins in the supremest reaches of their strings, in which the smallest bit of a queer little melody is dimly perceivable; this is reiterated and reiterated, until at length the stringed instruments slip down to their middle notes, and the tortured ear finds inexpressible refreshment in a few sweet, sonorous strains in which the wind instruments unite. Then after a brilliant and rather exciting crescendo, the customary barbaric work is done with quivering cymbals and frantic trombones, and finally the 'Vorspiel' goes back to its first love, and the violins scream out its conclusion."

To us this Vorspiel has as much poetry and beauty as anything we know in Wagner's music, but, instead of any "wail" or "shriek," or passion of any kind, it is all cold and clear as crystal, a purely intellectual fancy, so to speak. The picture could not have been presented to better advantage than by that orchestra,—unless in the theatre.—So brief a stay in the strange element one can endure, especially if he can so soon find himself at home again in such a masterpiece of deep, significant, intense, soul-stirring music as Beethoven's Overture to Egmont; a masterpiece of dramatic foreshadowing in a more natural and human way; compact, concise, where "every note draws blood." This, too, was played with fire and precision; yet we have felt its power as much in other renderings.

Here ended the serious programme. The lighter miscellany began with a Schlummer-lied by one named Bürgel:—a very commonplace sort of go-to-sleep melody, wrought up by strange and far-fetched arts of instrumentation so that the sleep seemed feverish and haunted by not quite pleasant dreams. There was a fine chance, however, for the pianissimo effect, which so transports a public. A veritable Concerto for the trombone came next! Who would believe it? And who was not in terror at the thought of its loud length? But it proved very gentle. It was composed by the French, Felicien David, we are told, and has a regular Allegro theme, treated Sonata-like, not uninteresting, nor without a certain elegance; followed by a melancholy Adagio, of course, much in the vein of the stereotyped prison scene soliloquy of your modern Italian opera; then for a finale, a da capo of the first movement. Mr. LEETZSCH's playing of this elaborate and often rapid piece was something marvellous. The huge instrument seemed to have unlearned all its roughness, and to sing as smoothly, with a voice as mellow as a horn; only in tones more round and solid. The execution was in all points unimpeachable. Now and then the instrument would touch its lower depths, as if to show that it had not forgotten its identity, and give out the real, startling trombone blast.

A luscious set of waltzes, "Königslieder," and an exceedingly quaint and piquant "Pizzicato Polka" by Strauss, probably delighted more than any of the light music; and the Thomas Orchestra play such things almost to perfection. The lightest in the list appeared to us to be the Overture to "Mignon," by Ambroise Thomas. A medley of commonplaces such as one hears in any theatre between the acts; in the more sentimental parts suggesting Gounod; a sprinkling here and there of harp passages, of course, since the old harper could not be left out from Wilhelm Meister; but rather a preponderance of trivial dance music. How can such a hodge-podge be called an Overture!

The second Concert (Wednesday evening) had a singular programme:

Pastoral Symphony.....	Beethoven.
Piano Concerto, No. 2, in A.....	Liszt.
"Blue Bird Overture".....	Wagner.
March of Pizarro (in the "Harold" Symphony).....	Berlioz.
Komarinka.....	Glinka.
Overture to "Genoveva".....	Schumann.

It was a perfect treat to hear the "Pastorale" rendered with such delicacy, such fine outline, with the warm colors breathed so softly upon the canvas, and the whole picture, with its contrasts, so consistent and complete. With such choice, true instruments as Thomas has—especially the reeds and horns, so noiseful here—it could not have been otherwise. The little opening melodic phrase, with all of summer in it, stole in with gentlest pianissimo, and June was all about us. The "Brookside" musing and meandering ramble was exquisitely perfect. The heavy peasant's dance, the storm, were wrought up to a startling climax,—just enough of it—one difference between Beethoven and these moderns of the "storm and stress" school,—and all the thankfulness and peace and sunshine of the finale was brought fully home to us.

Now think of Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz, in close succession! And all in their stormiest and most gloomy vein. The Liszt Concerto had never been played in this country before. It is a most extraordinary work, exceptional, fantastical and puzzling as to any unity of plan; abounding in unique, now wild now beautiful details; exceedingly difficult both for pianist and for orchestra; more like a long and fitful Orchestral Fantasia with florid, fitful pianoforte accompaniment, than a Concerto in the usual sense. First, aerial, mystical, fleeting snatches of strange harmony, sprinkled over orchestra and keyboard like showers upon the sea; then (in what order we can scarce remember) the most deep and dark and dismal of all funeral marches, with a great bell tolling in the bass of the piano; long spells of restless and self-torturing soliloquy; screaming climaxes, after the Wagner model; oft returning storms of a demoniac Celtic fury; exquisite bright fancies, most original, but gone in a moment; moments of heroic temper; now and then of peace and sweetness, but still with something sinister and Mephistophelian peeping in,—and so on, to what purpose? But taking each detail singly, what rare beauties, what dazzling, strange effects there were! The magician seems to have got you in his deep rock cavern, and to throw down to you now this now that strange, glittering lump of ore or crystal, calling out: "Now what do you think of that?" For the pianist to execute the flashing fragments as they fell to her turn, required all the powers of a consummate virtuoso, such as Miss MEHLIG possesses in the highest degree that we have yet witnessed here; and in point of virtuosity this was thus far her crowning effort; the triumph was complete.

Of the rest we have not room now to say what we would; we shall return to this concert next time.

CARLO LEFRANC. The concert troupe organized by Mr. Biscaccianti in the name of this admired Tenor of the Italian Opera of last winter, gave concerts in the Music Hall last week on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, and in the Boston Theatre on Sunday evening. What with stormy weather and the anticipation of greater things so soon to come, they were not well attended,—except the last. And indeed the day seems to have past here for these Italian macaroni programmes, made up mostly of the hacknied things from operas. LEFRANC revived the old enthusiasm by the splendid bursts of pure, sweet, ringing chest tone in the upper notes, especially the famous C in alt, and by his hearty, manly way of singing. In the Barcarole from Alasaniello, in the great Duet and Trio from Tell, the air from Il Trovatore, from I Lombardi, &c., he lent a freshness and a certain thrill to the well-worn strains. To our mind the most even, chaste and finished of his renderings was that of the Lombardi air. In more exacting pieces his voice and execution are very unequal, lacking distinctness in passages of medium force and register. We fear he throws away what there is glorious in his voice too generously.

Sig. REINA is in some respects a splendid baritone, and won great applause in the Tell pieces, and the dashing song of Figaro, though the humor of the latter was not in the fine vein of Ferranti. Our old friend SUSINI is but the shadow of himself in voice. A fresh and pleasing figure in the concerts was Miss IDA ROSENBERG, very young apparently, with a pure, sweet, light soprano, flexible and true, who sang remarkably well some of the well-worn florid airs from such operas as Linda and I Puritani, besides one from L'Africaine.

Mr. CHARLES WERNER proved himself a sound, artistic, excellent violoncello player; his tone very firm, large and true; his style manly and expressive. And his choice of pieces was much to his credit. For instance, the Variations by Mendelssohn, in which he had the fine accompaniment of Mr. B. J. LAW; the "Romanesca" by Servais; and the Sonata by old Arcangelo Corelli, in which there was so much suggestive of Handel. These and more he rendered with true intelligence and feeling, free from all mere sentimentality. We hope that Mr. Werner will return to us.

ENLERT'S LETTERS ON MUSIC.—The translator of this interesting little book (Mrs. FANNY RAYMOND RITTER) has received a very complimentary letter from the author, who writes:

—"On my return from a mountain tour, I found your admirable translation of my 'Letters' awaiting me. Your power of translating with such literal fidelity, and yet in so elegant a style, is astonishing to me. Thanks, too, for your Preface, which—if I except your flattering opinion of me—is entirely applicable to the subject, and the more impressive because written by a Lieder-singer par excellence, as I am informed you are. * * * It is not my intention to write a continuation of the 'Letters;' I am only an author during the leisure which my musical occupations permit; and no one can be sure of repeating any first success in a certain style, no matter how satisfactory this may have been."

PHILADELPHIA. The Bulletin, of Sept. 14, has the following account of the Handel and Haydn Society of that city:

Having brought out a large number of oratorios in this city, and always giving concerts celebrated for their thoroughness and perfection, they are also well known to our musical experts. The Society has recently removed from their old hall, at Eighth and Green streets, where they have been for many years, and have taken the hall formerly used by the Free German congregation, No. 445 North Fifth Street. The first meeting took place last evening, at their new hall, being the annual one of the stockholders, as well as the first held by the Society this season. From the annual report, which was presented, we glean the following facts: The stockholders number about eighty, and the officers consist of a board of fifteen, annually elected, who have control of all the interests of the Society. The membership numbers 162, the majority of whom are singers, and by whom the concerts, so justly celebrated, are given. In connection with the Society there is a very fine musical library, which is valued at $5,000, and which is constantly being added to by purchases, the amount expended last year for this purpose being $415 10. Three regular concerts were given during the season by the Society: on the 14th of December, 1869; February 8, 1870; April 19, 1870. Two extra concerts were also given, one of which was for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association, May 12, the last of the series taking place on the 31st of May. From the treasurer's report we learn that the receipts were $3,338 33. The expenditures were also heavy, footing up $3,048 61. The balance in the treasury is $289 71, which was the amount of profits of last season. The first general rehearsal of the Society will take place on Tuesday next, the 20th instant, at which none but members will be admitted. After the reading of the reports, the annual election for officers to serve the ensuing year was gone into, and the following gentlemen were declared to be elected: President, R. T. White; Vice-Presidents, J. G. Umsted and J. Barton Smith; Treasurer, Edward Bains; Secretary, E. F. Stewart; Librarian, J. H. Pilley; Directors, William N. Freeland, J. G. Marco, William M. Abbey, O. W. Millor, William Foley, J. G. Whiteman, R. B. Yates, Joseph Monier, James S. Francis.

Mr. Chas. H. Jarvis announces his ninth series of musical soirées for the coming winter. They will be given in rooms No. 1128 Chestnut street, beginning Nov. 19th, and continuing on the evenings of Dec. 10th, Jan. 21st, Feb. 18th, March 18th, and April 22d. Mr. Jarvis will be assisted by Mr. Wenzel Kopta, violin, and Mr. Rudolph Hennig, violoncello. The programmes which have been prepared are of a most attractive character. The following will be produced for the first time in public in this city.

Sonata—Piano and Violoncello, D minor.....Chopin.
 Sonata—Piano and Violin, A major.....Raff.
 Piano Solo—Solrce de Vienne après (Strauss).....Tausig.
 Piano Solo—Invitation à la Danse, (Von Weber)
 Transcribed by Tausig.
 Piano Solo—Toccata.....Domenico Scarlatti.
 Piano Solo—Abendlied, (Schumann), transcribed by Raff.
 Piano Solo—Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 18.....Liszt.
 Trio, No. 8—Piano, Violin and Cello, G minor, Op. 110.
 Schumann.

The Beethoven Society announces that its first rehearsal of the present season will take place on Tuesday evening next, at No. 1128 Chestnut street. A grand concert will be given by the Society, under the direction of its conductor, Mr. Carl Wolfsohn, at the Academy of Music, on the evening of the centennial birthday of Beethoven, December 17. The programme will consist entirely of the compositions of the great master, and will be given in a style, as regards quality of orchestra and vocal material, never before approached in Philadelphia. The Society has been preparing for this event for nearly a year, and its officers and members firmly trust that their labors may result in such a performance as will reflect credit upon the musical taste and cultivation of our city, and also form a proper tribute to the memory of the great Beethoven.—Ibid.

The New Opera Bouffe—Herve's "Petit Faust."

(From the New York Tribune, Sept. 27.)

Mr. James Fisk, Jr., opened the Erie Opera House last night with the new opera-bouffe company over whose importation so many blows have been expended and so many cards inflicted upon the public. Probably few persons supposed that a style of amusement which was so unfortunate last year could be revived with any profit to the manager, and we are not at all sure that Mr. Fisk himself expected to derive any other benefit from his adventure than the enjoyment of lively occupation and the charms of agreeable society. A dense, struggling crowd, however, besieged the doors last night, and filled the theatre to an uncomfortable point of tightness. An unusually large proportion of the audience consisted of men, and in the upper gallery there seemed to be not a few who had anticipated in a part of the entertainment some sort of personal encounter between Mr. Fisk and Mr. Maretzek, and manifested by occasional hissing and other demonstrations a readiness to take part in any fighting with which the fates might favor them. Up to the time of our departure, however, there was no appearance of any actual disorder.

A conscientious critic is expected to bestow praise wherever he honestly can, and therefore we begin our remarks upon the performance by saying that the "Little Faust" is put upon the stage with that superb contempt for expense which characterizes most of the theatrical ventures of the Erie Railroad Company, and that it contains one or two scenes which are decidedly funny. It is a travesty upon Gounod's "Faust," both in the plot and the music. Barlequesing the libretto, and stealing faint suggestions of the leading airs and musical situations. Thus a Soldiers' Chorus is introduced, and as the warriors file upon the stage, whippers of "the 9th Regiment" fly about the house, while Mr. Hitemans, who leads them in the character of Valentin, copies the commander of that gallant organization with an extravagant fidelity which we fear Col. Fisk in his stage-box did not fully appreciate. The duel with Faust and death of Valentin are also very comical. But here we must stop. As a whole, the opera is dull. The librettists, MM. Crémieux and Jaimé, knew no better way to turn the original into ridicule than to defile it with unmentionable jokes, and stuff it full of filthy conceits such as could enter into the head of no one but a Frenchman besotted with the poison of absinthe and the fumes of the Jardin Mabille. Fortunately, we are not yet educated to a taste for game of such very high flavor, and upon the greater part of the audience, foreign as it was in its general appearance, the fun fell very flat indeed. The music has hardly a redeeming quality. Not only is it worthless, but it is not even lively. It keeps just close enough to Gounod to suggest comparison and provoke impatience; we found in it not one happy conceit, not one air which tickles the popular ear, not a good chorus, and not an effective finale. After the second act (in the course of which there is a ballet of fearful length) hundreds of people, including a large minority of the women, left the theatre.

The troupe which makes its American debut in this very stupid work is inferior to the French companies imported in former years by Bateman and Grau, though it contains some good material. Mlle. Celine Montaland, (Marguerite), to whom the manager chiefly trusts his fortunes, is a handsome, sensuous woman, with a great deal of vivacity and a genius for vulgarity, at which Tostée might stand abashed. Of humor, apart from dirt, she showed no trace; but she seemed to afford a vast amount of pleasure to some of the men in the audience. Mlle. Lea Silly, the other prima-donna, was apparently content to exhibit her fine physical development in the accommodating garb of Mephisto. Whatever ability she may possess as an actress has yet to be shown. M. Gaussins (Faust) has an unpleasant nasal tenor, and a face which does not readily lend itself to dramatic expression. Not being naturally funny, he is always oppressed by his part, and the result is melancholy and at times exasperating. M. Hitemans, however, has real comic talent, and is the only funny person in the company, except a live skeleton-horse which is introduced with a fiacre. None of the troupe can sing.

We have used some pretty plain language in times past with reference to certain performances at the French Theatre, but we have no heart to speak of the "Petit Faust" in the terms which we think it deserves. We may say, however, that the credit belongs to Mr. Fisk of introducing a play more indecent and a prima-donna more revolting than any previously offered to the public of New York; and when we add that the nastiness is not relieved by anything pretty, or amusing, or witty, that it is not accompanied by even tolerably good music, that it stands out in fact in all its stark deformity, we have perhaps said all that the class of people who read our paper will care to hear.

TAKING IT SERIOUSLY. A correspondent, who modestly admits that he has no qualifications for being a musical critic save a good ear and a taste for music, writes amusingly to the London Observer that the unearthly "Flying Dutchman" of Richard Wagner affected him so strangely that he thinks his impressions of it may be worthy of a record. He says:

"The overture of the 'Dutchman' is representative of the legend. I endeavor to realize what it means. I got as far as waves in commotion, principally from the billow-like movements of Signor Ardit's baton; and after a time there is assuredly a violoncello that ought to go down below and call for the steward, while the cable or biggest string of a double-bass snaps with the stress put upon it by the storm of sound. The flutes do the wind in the cordage after the style of natural draughts through a key-hole in the month of March, and the thunder sets in upon the drum; and it strikes me that the entire brigade of musicians have general directions to make rain and darkness by letting their fingers run wild over the instruments. Curtain rises. Wailing in the orchestra. I have not the libretto before me, and I don't clearly remember the opening of the scene; but I never shall forget the appearance of the phantom ship and its crew. The former resembled a huge hearse, the latter were ghastly life-in-death objects which could only be produced under the inspiration of a lobster-salad supper. Music to correspond; music that suggested a dog howling on the door-step. . . . music compared to the skirl, the yelp, and the nasal agony of the Scotch bagpipes, are sweet and considerate sounds. And now Mr. Santly appears. . . . He sings, and the dog howls, and the cat mews and bleats, and the Scotchman has it his own way in the 'orchestral accompaniment.' Signor Ardit (who should have worn black, instead of white gloves) is grave, the audience are profoundly grave, the muffled corpses of the Shillibeer Gondola gaze on the pit, as gorged ghoul might do after a midnight banquet. A lady in the stalls whispers to her friend, 'Isn't it nice?' I do not agree with her. At every new gush of Acherontic harmony, Stygian floods of noise from the orchestra, I am more and more cast down in spirits, until the sense of melancholy becomes maddening. If this emotion is a complimentary tribute to the music of the future, I have no hesitation in confessing it. For depressing the mind, for clouding the brain with melancholy, our own poet Dr. Young, of the 'Night Thoughts,' is justly celebrated. Accepting Richard Wagner as a genuine tone-poet, Young might, indeed, have been fit to write a libretto for him, but that mournful person could never bring the darkness and gloom of material mortality so close to us as the super-humanly lugubrious German. In another state of existence the music of the future might be intelligible, though I do not hope even then to be able to understand it, for reasons that occurred to me in connection with the boat-load of Hollanders who sank into a hole of smoke and fire at the close of the opera. The Flying Dutchman himself fled aloft, leaving his clothes to his crew, no doubt in order that they might remember him in the place they were bound for, and, as he departed, there was a sob from the band that rang in my ears as an incantation to blue devils for many days."—Altogether he seems to fail in appreciating the good qualities of Herr Wagner's music.

In his admirable Biography of Michael Angelo (at first so violently attacked by the herd of commonplace critics), Hermann Grimm says that the statue of "Dawn," as it is called (in the Medici mortuary chapel) reminds him of a symphony by Beethoven—the reader, he observes, must excuse him for remarking that Goethe, also, was as pleased with the Ludovist Juno as with a "song by Homer." In his History of Art (fourth edition, p. 540) Lübke remarks: "The proper appreciation, the genuine enjoyment of his" (Michael Angelo's) "works, is, as a rule, a difficult task; hence it is generally a lie, whenever any one not profoundly acquainted with art breaks out into commonplace ecstasies over this artist's demoniacal creations, just as the raptures for Beethoven's later Titanic efforts are simply empty babble." This observation is justified by truth. I myself (the reader will excuse me, I trust, for introducing my own sensations), when I first became acquainted with Michael Angelo, on my first Italian journey to Florence and Rome, experienced a kind of scared astonishment; I admired with my whole soul, but I could not love. On my second journey, it seemed as though the scales had suddenly fallen from my eyes, and the effect then produced was simply overwhelming; the first impression had had time to mature in my soul, just as sour fruit becomes, if kept, ripe and sweet.

What the common, trivial intellect of mere art mechanics and critics thought at one time of Beethoven may be gathered from the old notices and correspondence of the Leipziger Musikzeitung; Spazier's Zeitung für die elegante Welt; the Morgenblatt, &c., notices and correspondence of which Lenz has reprinted a portion. But really the acme is attained when, for instance, the critic who first notices the Eroica in the Morgenblatt most urgently recommends as a model to Herr von Beethoven "the royal magnificence of the A major Symphony, by — Eberl, a Viennese fifth-rate composer (now forgotten)!" With regard to Michael Angelo, we cannot help being amused when we read in Kotzebue's Journey to Rome and Naples, that the author found nothing "great but the size" ("nichts gross als die Grösse")—the long marble beard being especially insupportable in his opinion; that, furthermore, the drawing of the "Last Judgment" swarms with coarse faults; here, there is a leg too long; there, an arm too short," &c. Fancy Kotzebue correcting Michael Angelo's drawing—this beats by far Mrs. Lennox pointing out Shakespeare's faults!

If we recollect Michael Angelo's austere and abrupt moral grandeur; the solitude into which, when old, he bashfully withdrew; his ideal friendship for Vittoria Colonna; and his touching love for his brothers, so greatly inferior to him intellectually, the analogous traits in Beethoven's life are very striking indeed. (A second Rochlitz would, probably, go on to remark that Michael Angelo at last became blind, and Beethoven, deaf; Michael Angelo enjoyed the Torso by touching it with the tips of his fingers; Beethoven read Handel's music with his eyes from the score). The positions, too, occupied by both these great men in the history of art certainly offer a remarkable analogy. Michael Angelo (I am employing Lübke's words), "was the first who recklessly broke with the schools, and it was in consequence of this that modern art commenced the dominion of subjectivity." The very same thing applies to Beethoven.

Michael Angelo pursued a short course of study (not quite three years) under Domenico

Ghirlandajo; Beethoven's course of study, also, was short and irregular. The immense genius of both compelled them to create; their masters could not keep up with them: "He can do more than I can," exclaimed Ghirlandajo, on seeing a drawing by his pupil; and Haydn, with anxious solicitude, tried to dissuade Beethoven from printing the C minor Trio, because it left behind it everything to which the public had been accustomed. Michael Angelo created every one of his figures out of his own inward life, he struggled with every one of his motives, and exclaimed, as Job once exclaimed when struggling with the angel: "I will not leave thee unless thou bleesest me." In the same way does Beethoven struggle with his musical motives; his "Thematische Arbeit" is something very different from that of his predecessors, which is essentially only contrapuntal, outward, and technical; he obtains from his motives, by continually fresh developments, their whole significant purport, their entire power of expression.

But here there is a great difference. Burkhardt (in the Cicerone) justly directs attention to the fact that, with Michael Angelo, the motive is always to be felt as such, and not as the most appropriate expression for a given purport. (The reader has only to remember the two Medici tombs, in order to see the great force of this observation.) With Beethoven the motive possesses of itself only a relative value; the principal point is that it shall say what it has to say. While Michael Angelo "is never pretty or pleasing" (Burkhardt) and has a partiality for the Colossal (the lovely angel on the Dominican tomb at Bologna, a youthful work, being the only instance which can be looked upon as an exception), Beethoven can smile and joke musically, and lay the prettiest trifles close to the feet of his Colossi.

A principal element in Beethoven—namely, humor, is altogether wanting in Michael Angelo (I do not regard as a stroke of humor the fact of the poor master-of-the-ceremonies, Biagio, being put in Hell,—if, mind, there is any truth in the whole story). The great Florentine is, too, deficient in Beethoven's tender warmth, and noble, elevated sentiment (for, after all, Michael Angelo's gentlest and most loveable effort, the Delphic Sybil, is a giantess). Beethoven can frequently become good-humored and absolutely jolly (the last comes under the category of humor); it is scarcely more than on one occasion that Michael Angelo makes an attempt at a mild smile—in the picture of the mothers brought by their coaxing and loving children into the most fearful throng (among the ancestors of Christ in the Sixtine).

In approaching the very furthest limits of the Possible the two masters are true brothers. The unrivalled master of anatomy sometimes presents us with what is impossible anatomically, and the unrivalled master of harmony with what is impossible harmonically. (By this I do not allude so much to the notorious chord in the finale of the "Ninth," or the horn in the Eroica, which nearly obtained for poor Ries a box on the ear, as, for instance, to an irreconcilable opposition between strings and wind, such as occurs in the 126th bar of the "Scene at the Brook," or the much-discussed passage in the "Lebewohl Sonata," where the tonic harmony and the dominant harmony assert themselves simultaneously. Finally, Michael Angelo, like Beethoven, exercised great influence over subsequent art; the traditions of the schools still existed in Mozart, as they existed in Raphael and Leonardo da Vinci. Beethoven escaped from them, and set up his own mighty individuality—exactly like Michael Angelo. At present the individual is emancipated. The old, true tradition from Cimabue down to Raphael, from Dufay down to Mozart, is now merely a fetter binding the pinions of genius. The types of the great and last model are in consequence the more borrowed and copied. But, because those who take them have not produced them from their own inward life, have not gained them from out a struggle with themselves, as their creators did, these types possess the unbearable characteristics of a lie, of what is in itself untrue. Any one, desirous of seeing what mischief Michael Angelo did, has only to look at Salvati's "Resurrection" in (in the Belvedere, 1st floor, Cabinet Eight, number of picture, 37, opposite Andrea del Sarto's fine "Pietà").

Especially beautiful is one of the Marys, who, without rhyme or reason, apes the motive of one of the gigantic saints (to the left and close to the Almighty Judge) in the "Last Judgment." This picture bears a remarkable analogy with the Ninth Symphony. Touches, such as the high A of the soprano sustained for thirteen bars, and the angel who allows the shaft of the scourge to be clapped on his stomach, are of the same kidney; they are equally unmeaning, and—equally the work of genius. After the "Last Judgment," just as authors were unable to paint anything smaller than Battles of the Titans, Overthrows of Demons, &c.; just as the "Last Judgment," with its motives, peeps out everywhere (see Brangin's "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," in St. Lorenzo; Bugiardi's St. Catherine, in Maria Novello, at Florence &c.), so, for a long time, no composer ever got his music-paper ready for a symphony without the "Ninth" standing like a bugbear behind him. "Who can still write symphonies like Mozart and Haydn?" is the general cry. I take you at your word, gentlemen; who can still write symphonies like Mozart and Beethoven? Would that you could.

What first came after Raphael and Michael Angelo, and what after Mozart and Beethoven, looks more or less like an aftergrowth—musically we are Epigoni; Wagner strikes me as being a purifying, though anything but a fertilizing storm. But for plastic art new paths were opened, and new triumphal garlands earned (Reubens, &c.), while lastly came the legitimate successors of the great old masters, such men as Karstern, Schick, Wächter, Cornelius, Overbeck, our magnificent Schwind; our virile, splendid Führich, whose only fault consisted in his being too Christian for people; and Kaulbach, whose Battle of the Huns always strikes me as an alliance between Raphael and Michael Angelo, but who, unfortunately, afterwards mistook the right road—and we see where he is. Shall not music blossom in a similar manner at some future time?

In one thing, however, Michael Angelo was more fortunate than Beethoven. No annotators have chosen him as a means of showing how awfully clever they are. As a matter of course, everyone must be able to gather from Beethoven's works (or interpolate in them) whatever pleases him. For instance, in perfect innocence of heart, we looked upon the C minor symphony as a picture of the struggle going on in the recesses of our soul, and of the victory achieved by that soul's Creator; but we were recently informed that Beethoven here intended to present us with an epitome of his political opinions. As, however, every reading is allowable, I beg leave to advance the following: In my opinion, Beethoven did not want to portray his political opinions in a lump, but rather his dissatisfaction at the Continental Blockade, then just introduced by the first Napoleon. Look at the first allegro with the double-knock motive — | —, is not that Beethoven at the coffee-house, rapping in vain for some coffee? In the A flat andante, flowing like sweet honey, the waiter brings him, instead of coffee, a bavaroise; in the defiant C major Beethoven bellows out for his coffee: the waiter looks anxiously around, and, after a time again brings the bavaroise, but this time milled with "Obers." The succeeding allegro depicts Beethoven's resignation at having in future to drink chicory-coffee: it is true that it disagrees with him (the fugged theme of the basses), but what can he do? He already thinks of soup made of roasted butter (the conclusion with the weird-like kettle-drum), when—yes—yes—the Continental Blockade is suddenly raised; great stores of coffee arrive from Hamburg; jubilation-finale! I give this interpretation for our Beethoven commentators to think over; they will perceive from it with what respectful admiration I have read and studied their clever essays.

When anything did not suit him, Beethoven was in the habit of heartily laughing at it. His owl-like sapient interpreters would probably have afforded him a fine opportunity for indulging in this propensity. Perhaps his intellectual relative, Michael Angelo, would have helped him!

A Study on Sebastian Bach.

(From the "Musical Standard," London.)

It is well known that the family of the Bachs was one of humble origin; it has been traced back, through upwards of a hundred years, to a miller and baker of Presburg. It possessed, however, from the first the earnest of that mighty musical talent which was to render its name for ever notable. Through all the numerous branches of this family there flowed a rich vein of music, which was cherished among them as their greatest treasure, and which, being united with unusual energy and perseverance, raised its owners to honorable positions connected with their art, and caused the name of Bach to be known as organist, choirmaster, cantor, or bandmaster, throughout the regions of Thuringia, Saxony, and Franconia. For many years it was a custom among the Bachs that all the scattered members of their family should meet once in the year—either at Eisenach, Erfurt, or Arnstadt—for the purpose of comparing progress, and for the performance of musical works, often their own compositions, which were afterwards collected and carefully preserved in the family archives. Thus was the present talent cultivated, accumulating until in 1685 was born an heir worthy of such an heritage, one destined to unveil the glories of an art hitherto comparatively but little known; and who in so doing, despite his own extreme modesty, and his carelessness of worldly greatness, would immortalize the name of Bach.

John Sebastian Bach was born at Eisenach. His father, a musician, died when he was ten years of age, and he was left an orphan, under the care of his eldest brother, John Christian, to whom he owed his first instructions in music. His intense love of the art seems, however, to have met with little real sympathy or encouragement from his brother; and we read with irrepressible indignation, how, when with undaunted zeal he had labored for six months over the copying of some much-coveted manuscripts of valuable compositions belonging to John Christian, and labored over it by moonlight for fear of discovery (his brother having previously refused to lend them to him), his work was found out, and the transcript ruthlessly taken from him, only to be regained upon his brother's death. This event, which occurred shortly afterwards, left him entirely dependent on his own exertions for a livelihood; and he accordingly obtained a place as treble chorister in the church of St. Michael, Lünebourg. From this place he would often walk to Hamburg, in order to hear Reinken, who was organist there, and whose playing was of much renown. Sebastian retained his place as chorister until his voice broke; he then obtained employment as violinist at the Court of Weimar, and subsequently became organist in Arnstadt, one of the three cities which had witnessed the yearly gathering of his ancestors. While here he labored perseveringly, studying the works of the best organists of his day, often visiting Lubeck to gain a practical lesson from the celebrated organist Buxtehude; at one time his enthusiasm even led him to spend three months secretly in this city, that he might study more closely the manner and style of the much admired artist. In 1707 he became organist of the church of St. Blasius, Mühlhausen, which appointment he in the following year exchanged for the higher position of organist at the Court of Weimar, where, in 1717, he was appointed director of the Court concerts. The year 1720 saw him made kapellmeister to Prince Leopold, of Anhalt-Koethen, an office of considerable dignity.

Sebastian Bach was now over thirty years of age, but though his pen had been constantly at work, nothing had as yet been given to the world; such was his earnest conscientiousness to the dignity of his art, and so humble his opinion of his own works. He now (in 1722) published the first part of the celebrated work with which his name is so especially connected—the "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues." Reinken was still living, but was now far advanced in years; and Bach, who retained all his early admiration of him, now again visited him, this time to kindle by his own genius the enthusiasm of the musician whose playing had so often fired his soul. With earnest attention the old man listened while Bach extemporized for more than an hour on the chorale, "By the waters of Babylon," and then with touching emotion he expressed his joy and gratitude that the cherished art, which he had feared must die with him, had found another and a mightier exponent than himself.

In 1733, J. S. Bach quitted the service of Prince Leopold, to hold the last and most important of his offices, that of Director of Music in St. Thomas's School at Leipzig. His subsequent appointments to be honorary kapellmeister to the King of Poland (Augustus III.), and composer to the Duke of Weissenfels, making little change in his circumstances beyond some increase of income as well as dignity. It was in Leipzig that most of his motets and church cantatas, besides numerous other works, were written. The untiring industry of his youth had now received its reward in the quiet consciousness of power; and his unabating reverence for his art led him to use his genius in composing such music only as should exalt its dignity. Feeling that to compromise his art would be to compromise himself, he allowed no composition of his to pass through the press until he had first subjected it to the severest scrutiny. In teaching, he adhered to those principles which had ever been his guide, and seems to have expected from his pupils an earnest devotion and self-denying conscientiousness similar to his own. Forkel's description of the system and principles on which he based his instruction is so interesting, even in its quaintness, that we think it scarcely necessary to ask the reader's patience while we quote the passage, even should it be already familiar to his mind:—

Sebastian Bach considered music entirely as a language, and the composer as a poet, who, in whatever language he may write, must never be without sufficient expressions to represent his feelings. . . . In all exercises of composition, Seb. Bach rigorously kept his pupils—1st, to compose entirely from the mind, without an instrument; 2ndly, to pay constant attention, as well to the consistency of each single part, in and for itself, as to its relation to the parts connected and concurrent with it. No part—not even a middle one—was allowed to break off before it had entirely said what it had to say. Every note was required to have a connection with those preceding it; did any one appear of which it was not apparent whence it came, or whither it tended, it was instantly banished as suspicious. This high degree of exactness in the management of every single part is precisely what makes Bach's harmony a manifold melody. The confused mixture of the parts, so that a note which belongs to the tenor is thrown into the counter-tenor, and the reverse; further, the unreasonable falling in of several notes in simple harmonies, which, as if fallen from the sky, suddenly increase the number of the parts in a single passage, to vanish in the next, and in no manner belong to the whole, is not to be found either in Bach or in any of his scholars. He considered his parts as persons who conversed together like a select company. If there were three, each could sometimes be silent, and listen to the others, till it again had something to the purpose to say. But if, in the midst of the most interesting part of the discourse, some uncalled for and importunate notes suddenly stepped in and attempted to say a word, or even a syllable only, without sense or vocation, Bach looked on this as a great irregularity, and made his pupils comprehend that it was not to be allowed.

It is to be feared that such a "high degree of exactness" in the present day, if brought to bear upon our modern music, would seriously diminish the number of the "new publications" constantly issuing from our ware-houses! Whether such an austere measure as "instant banishment" executed upon all those notes "importunate and uncalled for," which upon impartial examination should be found in them, would be beneficial or not to the musical world is a question which, if raised, would no doubt stir up ceaseless, and perhaps not always amicable discussion; we decline therefore to urge it here, and content ourselves with the expression of a doubt existing in our own mind whether, after such a winnowing of the chaff, there would be found in many of these compositions sufficient grain to authorize their publication consistently with the desire, which should exist in the mind of every publisher as well as composer, like Sebastian Bach, to give to the world such music only as will "end to exalt the dignity of the art." It may be argued that in the present days of ever-increasing activity of mind and life, it is impossible to expect the measured dignity and precision of arrangement exhibited in Sebastian Bach's works: it is unsuited to the present phase of human life. Granted, with certain reservations. We own that we do think it very unlikely that we shall find the dignity of Sebastian Bach, or anything approaching to it, in the great majority of compositions of the present day (we allude more particularly to the mass of so-called "Pieces" for the pianoforte, which, instead of exalting art, tend only to degrade it). We are not, however, contending for obsolete forms and rules of composition (though we cannot agree with Hector Berlioz when he condemns Cherubini's veneration for the authority of "the classics" as an idolatrous surrender of his own judgment); we do not desire that the music even of Sebastian Bach, or Handel, or any other ancient writer, should be played in our concert-rooms and drawing-rooms, to the exclusion of other and more generally attractive works; but we think it would be well if the warning of Cherubini (whom Berlioz could not approve, but Mendelssohn considered "matchless") were more widely known and heeded: "Whatever the piece composed—so that it be well conceived, regular, and conducted with good intention—it should, without bearing precisely the character and form of a fugue, at least possess its spirit."

We have wandered away from the days of Bach, and have taxed our reader's patience beyond what we had intended when we asked his attention to our quotation from Forkel's work; but it will serve now as a connecting link between the above remarks and our present "Study," to remark that, though Bach's own works were all of the strictest style, he could still appreciate works of a lighter description, and was in the habit of going often to Dresden to hear and enjoy the light and pretty operas of Hasse, then performing in that city.

The name of John Sebastian Bach was now known far and wide; but there was yet one more laurel to be added to his wreath ere he should be summoned to obtain the fulness of the knowledge which he had as yet, after all, known but "in part."

The throne of Prussia was at this time (1747) occupied by a music-loving monarch, and Emanuel, the second son of Sebastian Bach, was his chamber musician. Frederic II., himself a skilful amateur performer, desired greatly to hear the far-famed organist, and Bach was persuaded by his son to visit Potsdam. Immediately on his arrival he was summoned to the palace, where the monarch received him with an enthusiastic welcome. There he played and extemporized before a delighted audience, working up a subject given him by the king, upon which subject he afterwards based an elaborate work dedicated to Frederic II., in memory of the evening. This was the last notable event in the life of the great musician. He returned to Leipsic, and there three years later he breathed his last, after an illness of six months, brought on, it is supposed, by the powerful remedies unavailing used to relieve him of the total blindness from which he suffered. Ten days before his death he suddenly regained his sight, but only to take a farewell view of the sunlight which had so often shone upon his labor, and then to close his eyes again, in hope of the "resurrection of the just." He died in the year 1750, at the age of sixty-six.

Sebastian Bach was a zealous Lutheran; his church music was therefore chiefly written for a Protestant service, though he wrote also for the Church of Rome. In his sacred cantatas he loved to interlink those grand old chorales which had so often been the solace of the great Reformer of his Church. Strangers that within that very city of Eisenach should be born, two centuries later, the mighty musician who should take up those time-honored strains, and in giving them a nobler and more enduring form, secure to his Church an echo of her beloved Luther's voice, and gain for himself the honorable title of "The Musician of the Reformation!"

In all the relations of life—as a husband, a father, and a friend—the character of Sebastian Bach is free from reproach. His distinguishing characteristics were—the great simplicity of his mind and habits, and his total freedom from any personal vanity. He never sought popular applause, nor desired publicity; he devoted himself to the care and education of his large family, and lived a quiet, sunshiny life of genial contentment. Nothing could induce him in any way to traffic with his art, or to bring his music down to his audience. He was ever true to his own standard of right, and in all his compositions self-satisfaction was his aim, and thus he constantly revised and corrected his works, until he left them models for all future time. His music is specially remarkable for the purity of his part-writing, and the power of his counterpoint. He employed passing notes more freely than any writer had hitherto done, and introduced a new and more convenient system of fingering. Industry was his chief teacher, and his principles of composition seem to have been greatly formed from the study of Vivaldi's writings: he would speak of these as having been his guide. He himself said that work had been the secret of his strength, and was wont to define genius as "a long Patience." Thus did even the greatest of musicians search for the knowledge of his art as for "hidden treasure;" and, in truth, he found a high reward.

ANGLO-SAXON.

Sims Reeves.

This eminent tenor was born at Woolwich in the year 1821. So rapid was his progress in music, that before he had reached his fourteenth year he was a clever performer on several instruments, and tolerably versed in the theory of composition. At this early age he was appointed organist and director of the choir at the church of North Cray in Kent. Not only did he worthily fulfil the duties of his office, but in addition composed some chants and anthems that were highly creditable to his talents. Meanwhile, he assiduously continued his study of the theory of music, and took lessons on the pianoforte of the celebrated John Cramer. Whilst engaged as organist at North Cray, it was discovered that he had a voice of magnificent quality and great strength. He was immediately placed under a professor of singing, and by the advice of his friends exclusively devoted his energies to this branch. He made his first appearance at Newcastle in his nineteenth year, in the baritone parts of Rodolpho, in the Sonnambula, and of Dandini in Cenerentola. His debut was a complete success, although he had mistaken the character of his voice. He next visited the chief towns of Ireland and Scotland, in each acquiring fame. His friends and the public looked upon him as a finished singer; but he had too keen a conception of musical perfection to be satisfied with his style and knowledge. He accordingly visited Paris, and studied under some of the best masters. When he returned to this country he appeared in the provinces and in Ireland. The provincial public and the provincial press were equally loud in their laudations. London managers were eager to secure such an invaluable prize. Tempting offers were made to him, but were positively and firmly declined. Mr. Reeves was determined to visit Italy, to perfect himself still more in his favorite art. Arrived at Milan, he took lessons of Mazzucato, one of the most distinguished masters of that city. In a short time he appeared at the Scala in the character of Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor. His fortune was now made. The sweetness of his voice, his brilliant execution, his vocal power, and his dramatic talent, electrified the audience. He had worked hard, and waited patiently, and his triumph was now complete. He remained at Milan two years, during which time he pursued his studies with ardor.

At this period Mr. Jullien was getting together a company for an operatic season at Drury Lane. He offered Mr. Reeves an engagement, which was accepted, for the time had arrived when he felt that he might appear before a London audience triumphantly. He made his debut at Drury Lane on the 6th of December, 1847, and selected for this occasion the part of Edgardo. The theatre was crowded to hear the English singer who had gained such success in Italy. The house received him with enthusiasm, and the next day the press confirmed the favorable verdict in terms of hearty and unqualified praise. The only other opera he appeared in during the season, and in which he sustained his first original character, was Balfe's Maid of Honor.

In 1848, Mr. Reeves appeared at her Majesty's theatre, and proved that he was fully equal to any Italian tenor on the stage. In the following year he appeared at the Norwich festival, and in the winter concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and showed that he was quite as capable of singing the superb compositions of Handel and Mendelssohn, as he was of doing justice to operatic music. In classical and sacred music he is indeed unrivalled. In the spring of 1851 he visited Paris, and appeared at the Italian opera as Ernani, with Signora Cravelli as Elvira. His singing and acting produced quite a fièvre. The French critics, not easily satisfied, compared him advantageously with the celebrities of the lyric stage. It is impossible to follow this gifted singer throughout his career of artistic triumphs; suffice it that no other Englishman has appeared successfully as the first tenor at the leading theatres of England, France, and Italy. Much of the above information has been derived from an excellent biography in the Illustrated News of some few years back.

Mr. Robert K. Bowley.

Those who for some thirty years past, have been among the figures most familiar to musical London are rapidly disappearing from the scene. The Sacred Harmonic Society has lost two of its oldest, most valuable and energetic members: its venerable President, Mr. Harrison, who died the other day, at a very advanced age, and Mr. Robert Bowley, to whose shrewdness, energy of persistence, and thorough habits of business is largely due its present high—we might say unparalleled—position among the Musical societies of Europe. Napoleon the First contemptuously called England "a nation of shopkeepers." Ours, in more than one notable instance, have done for Music that which the aristocratic and opulent, at home and abroad, with all their superiority of wealth, refinement, and intellectual training, have failed to accomplish. The Antient Concerts, though to the last upheld by our Prince Consort, our Wellington, relative to Lord Mornington, and like him keenly alive to the pleasures of music, Lord Howe, Lord Darnley, Lord Dartmouth, and other amateurs no less distinguished and liberal, were virtually swept from the face of musical London by the Exeter Hall Oratorios.

These began queerly enough; though with a certain earnest of purpose, excellent to note in men otherwise so practically occupied; whereas the dilettanti, who ruled the Antient Concerts, had only rank, leisure, taste, and money on their side. The indigenous voices of London called out to make a chorus were anything but rich and tuneful thirty-five years ago. The "Antients" drew their supplies from Lancashire; and those were days when the journey from Lancashire to London was an affair of some eight-and-twenty hours. But a few tradesmen in the west end of London were resolved to have music of their own, and to Mr. Harrison, in St. James's Street, and Mr. Bowley, at Charing Cross, was mainly due the establishment of the Sacred Harmonic Society. For a time this body may have been said to exist rather than to flourish. Nevertheless, by its appeal to popular favor, and its courage as superseding the old intolerable playhouse oratorios which were no longer to be endured by persons of any artistic culture, the Sacred Harmonic Society began to excite curiosity, attention, and respect; and its promoters were wise enough to profit by the strictures which the imperfection of their performances excited, to strengthen their orchestra, and to weed their chorus. A hampering influence, however, existed in the person of the original conductor, who, however well-intentioned, was, in no respect, equal to the situation. After a time, Mr. Surman and the Society separated, and the latter was placed in the hands of Sir Michael Costa. The result was at once immediate and progressive. Before many years were over, the Sacred Harmonic Society was strong enough to lend a well-drilled squadron of musicians to provincial performances, to gather a library, to establish a benevolent fund, and, lastly, to lead up to those stupendous gatherings at the Crystal Palace, which, when all in their disfavor regarding the vastness of their locality is said, remain, and will remain, in musical history, as among the most magnificent displays of art ever seen in Europe. The greatest share in this progress and prosperity is, beyond question, due to the shrewd foresight, energy, and administrative power of Mr. Bowley. Without such an organization, the Sydenham Oratorios would have been so many chaotic failures.

It is not to be wondered at that the directors of that preposterous building (for preposterous it is with all its magnificence) should be naturally attracted by the skill in generalship to which allusion has been made. In a lucky hour, the management of the Crystal Palace was, fourteen years ago, placed in the hands of Mr. Bowley. The right man was in the right place. He was firm, indefatigable, ingenious, of unimpeachable probity. Never was there an officer at once more resolute in carrying out his plans, yet more willing to receive suggestions, always at his post, always with a resource at hand in case of difficulty. Hence, he was habitually called in and consulted whenever any great celebration was to be organized. In brief he was an excellent and remarkable example of administrative powers such as are given to few, and which entitle his name to a permanent record in the history of English exhibitions of art.

Such a life, however, as his is not to be led with impunity. The incessant strain on every nerve and every faculty, the honest resolution to fulfil every duty of a most onerous stewardship, could not but have told on one of greater physical power and a healthier habit of body than himself. It had been obvious, for some some time past, that Mr. Bowley's health was beginning to give way, but the end was hastened by the decease of his friend and comrade of many years standing, Mr. Harrison. The mind finally lost its balance, and a few days ago his life was sadly closed by a catastrophe, the details of which have been too largely laid before the public to be dwelt on here. It is enough for the present to insist that in the position he occupied, and for the duties he undertook, Mr. Bowley was emphatically a rare man, whose place will not be soon, if it be ever, filled.—Musical World.

Something about the Composer and the Writer of the Song "Die Wacht am Rhein."

Wilhelm, born on the 5th September, 1815, at Schmalkalden, in Thuringia, received his first musical instruction from his father, who was an organist. He continued his studies in the years 1834-36 at Cassel, under Baldewin and Bott, Musicaldirectoren, and also under the celebrated old master, L. Spohr, whose amiable readiness to assist him exercised a great influence on the progress of the industrious youth. His further studies he pursued under that admirable master of pianoforte playing, Aloys Schmidt, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and studied counterpoint under Herr A. André, at Offenbach. In 1841, he settled at Crefeld, and began as a music master. His musical value was appreciated in educated circles there, and he was soon elected director of the Singacademie for mixed chorus, as well as of the Liedertafel. The latter raised itself so much under his direction, that it equalled the best associations for male singing in Germany. During his twenty-four years' residence at Crefeld, Wilhelm composed about one hundred of his most celebrated pieces for piano; one voice; and mixed chorus; and, more especially, a chorus of male voices. We will here mention only "Frühlingszeit," "Waldlust," "Auf der Wacht," "Mädchen, wenn ich von Dir ziehe," &c. But he was most inspired as a composer by patriotic words. Thus, in the year 1854, the "Wacht am Rhein" sprang into life.

In 1865, on the occasion of the Singers' Festival at Dresden, Müller von der Werre said, somewhere in his writings, that this grand patriotic effusion had not only made the round of land and sea, but was regularly established as a national song. The German nation has, in 1870, confirmed the assertion. In consequence of long and frequent illness, Wilhelm was compelled, to the great regret of his many friends, when he was only about fifty-five, to retire from the direction of the vocal association—though the step cost him a great effort. In 1865, he was induced by still more severe sicknesses, and a yearning for his native hills, to give up his long disinterested efforts for the Liedertafel, and return to Schmalkalden, where he at present resides. Unfortunately, the feeling of oppression caused by the death of his mother, an old lady of eighty-three, which occurred three years since, and by the newly awakened longing to revisit Crefeld, for so many years his second home, has permitted him but too rarely to indulge in fresh musical creations. He produced, however, in 1868, a magnificent chorus for male voices—"Wache auf, Deutschland" (words by Emil Ritterhaus), with the burden, "Kein Fuss weit von dem Deutschen Lande soll je Französisch werden." (Not a foot's breadth of German soil shall ever become French.) It is no doubt included in a collection of twelve patriotic songs for chorus of male voices, of which an edition of ten thousand copies, under the title "1870," is published by M. Schloss, Cologne, for the benefit of the wounded soldiers, and of the relatives of those who have fallen.—At present it has been established by documentary evidence that it was Max Schneckeburger, who wrote the words of "Die Wacht am Rhein." His widow, who lives at Thalheim, near the Tattlingen, Württemberg, possesses a letter from Schneckeburger, to whom she was then engaged, in which he enclosed her the words of the song, written at the request of some friends. Max Schneckeburger was born on the 17th February, 1819, at Thalheim, where his father was a tradesman. As far back as his fifteenth year, he exhibited his turn for poetry by writing poems, which he had printed, a step that, according to the Schwäbischer Merkur, he afterwards regretted often enough. He was a well-educated and very well-read man, and made a select collection of books, which are still in the possession of his widow. He died, when thirty, in 1849, at Burgdorf, near Berne, where he was established in business, and where he founded some ironworks. His eldest son is a rifleman in the Württemberg division of the German army.

LA MARSEILLAISE.—The New York Sun has the following:

The Hymn of Liberty, proscribed during Louis Bonaparte's twenty years' Reign of Terror, again resounds throughout France as of old, enkindling the valor and patriotism of her sons. Attention being again specially directed to this wonderful war lyric, accounts of its origin are published which are not altogether trustworthy. It was composed in 1792 by Rouget de Lisle, and I happen to possess what may be a rare musical work, which gives the composition and the story of its birth from the composer's own hand. This work, like musical publications generally, bears no date, but was evidently published in the early part of this century. It is the complete author's edition of the songs, fifty in number, of Rouget de Lisle, and has this title: "Cinquante Chants Français. Paroles de différents auteurs. Mises en musique avec accompagnement de piano par Rouget de Lisle, A Paris, chez Carli, Boulevard Montmartre No. 14. Prix, 50 fr." In a note the composer states that all of these songs except one, No. 29, a Hymn of Liberty, were composed by himself. The Marseillaise Hymn, No. 23 of the collection, is prefaced by the following words, which I translate literally:

"No. 23.

"HYMNE DES MARSEILLAIS.

"I wrote the words and the air of this song at Strasbourg during the night which followed the declaration of war at the end of April, 1792. Called at first the Song of the Army of the Rhine, it reached Marseilles by the way of a constitutional journal conducted under the auspices of the illustrious and unfortunate Dietrich. When it made such an explosion [sic] some months afterward I was wandering in Alsace under the burden of dismissal from office, incurred at Illingen for having refused my adhesion to the catastrophe of the 10th August, and was pursued by immediate proscription, which in the following year, at the commencement of the terror, threw me into the prisons of Robespierre, whence I was only liberated after the 9th Thermidor.

The above is probably the only authentic account of the production of the immortal Marseillaise from the pen of its inspired author-composer, and possesses accordingly a peculiar interest.

Mme. Sainton-Dolby's Farewell Concert.

[A friend sends us the following slip from a London paper, without date.]

At her annual concert given in St. James's Hall yesterday afternoon, Mme. Sainton-Dolby bade farewell to the public she has so long and faithfully served. We have not enough great English artists to make the retirement of one an event of no consequence, and therefore yesterday's leave-taking had a legitimate claim upon attention. But, because it was the leave-taking of Mme. Sainton-Dolby, a claim not only legitimate, but special, was superadded. Few artists can boast a career so long, so uniformly successful, and so intimately connected with the progress of English music in its highest forms. Few artists, let us add, have held a prominent place with more rightful pretensions, or have shown themselves better fitted by ability, conscientiousness, and zeal to minister to the public pleasure. For these reasons we are justified in regarding Mme. Sainton-Dolby's farewell as one of particular significance, and in treating it accordingly.

Mention has already been made of the uniform success enjoyed by our English contralto; and it may be interesting to note that success attended her at the very beginning of her professional life. Charlotte Dolby had not been long in the Royal Academy of Music—we speak now of events that took place thirty-six years ago—before she was chosen as one of the semi-chorus in connection with the Ancient Concerts. Whatever the value of the Ancient Concerts to their patrons and the public, there can be little doubt that to the enthusiastic girl-student they were worth much. Malibran, Grisi, Caradori, Mario, Rubini, Braham, Tamburini, Lablache—in short, every available great artist of the time—sang at those exclusive gatherings; and the singing of each, we need scarcely add, was a lesson for the young chorist who so soon became eminent herself.

In 1837 Miss Dolby gained the King's scholarship at the Royal Academy; and in 1840-41 she made her first tour (under the management of Mr. Henry Blagrove, and accompanied by Miss Bruce and Lindley, the violoncellist) to the provinces, where she was destined to find so many admirers. About this time also Miss Dolby first sang at the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society—concerts from which, during thirty years, she was never absent an entire season. Her relations with this great society are now unique for long duration and unswerving constancy. Moreover they were the origin of reminiscences which must have a place among those she cherishes with special fondness. It was at a concert in Exeter Hall that Miss Dolby made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn, who, delighted with her rendering of the lovely air from "St. Paul," "But the Lord is mindful," asked an introduction to his English interpreter. The friendship thus happily begun was not less happily continued; for, in the same year (1849), Miss Dolby fulfilled an engagement at the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts, then under the joint directorship of Mendelssohn and Gade.

In 1846, as every reader of musical history knows, Mendelssohn was busy with his last great work, "Elijah," in regard to which, and in connection with Miss Dolby, an anecdote is told that has never, so far as we know, appeared in print. At a dinner to which both the composer and the singer were invited, Mendelssohn apologized for being late, on the ground that "Elijah" had detained him, and added, "I have sketched the bass part, and now for the contralto." Some interest was naturally expressed in the latter by the English guest, upon which Mendelssohn rejoined, "It will suit you very well, for it is a true woman's part, half-angel, half-devil." The master's definition may have been wrong, but his prediction was right. The contralto music of "Elijah" has suited Mme. Sainton-Dolby to some purpose; and, let us add, she has, in an equal degree, suited it. That she did not take part in the memorable Birmingham Festival of 1847, when the last great oratorio was produced, is a matter of history; but it is no less a matter of fact that she very speedily became Mendelssohn's accepted interpreter. At the successive performances of "Elijah" in Exeter Hall, under the composer's own direction, Miss Dolby sang the contralto airs, and Mendelssohn's impulsive words, "Thank you, from my heart, Miss Dolby," after, "O, rest in the Lord," are never likely to be forgotten by her to whom they were addressed. From that time to the present Mme. Sainton has occupied the post of first English contralto, with how much credit to herself and advantage to the public we need not say. To discuss the merits of the artist at whose career we have just glanced would be superfluous. They are known and appreciated by everybody who takes the slightest interest in musical matters; and the remembrance of them will be cherished in proportion to their rarity.

Coming now to yesterday's concert, it will be assumed that St. James's Hall was crowded by a sympathetic audience, to whom Mme. Sainton's farewell was of greater interest than a capital programme and a long array of artists. Mme. Monbelli, Mme. Sinico, Mme. Volpini, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Gardoni, and Signor Gassier contributed the foreign element indispensable to the success of all great concerts during the London season; but their doings need not detain us, the pieces sung being quite as familiar as the singers. What was done by the English artists deserves more attention, if only because three songs from Mme. Sainton's own pen fell to their lot. These were, "The Village Bridge" (Mr. Lewis Thomas), "A Bridal Song" (Mr. W. H. Cummings), and "Marjorie's Almanac" (Miss Edith Wynne)—works which fairly represent the composer's ability, and which, admirably rendered, made as good an effect as anything in the programme. Other songs were given by Mme. Sherrington, Miss Angèle, Messrs. Byron, Maybrick, and Santley; the London Glee and Madrigal Union pleasantly varying the proceedings with contributions from their favorite repertory. We must not forget to mention also that M. Sainton played with Mr. Walter Macfarren a set of three romances for violin and piano by the latter gentleman, and joined Messrs. Benedict and Lemmens in Gounod's meditation on Bach's first prelude, doing both in the excellent way for which he is distinguished. The bénéficiaire sang four times, two of her pieces being sacred and two secular. That she was received with applause, again and again renewed, we need hardly say; and, as though stimulated to a special effort, Mme. Sainton sang in a manner that deepened the regret of parting. Rarely has she given Handel's "What though I trace" ("Solomon") with more expressive power or greater perfection of style. As much might be said with regard to the "Evening Prayer" from "Eli," the pathos and tenderness of which could not have been surpassed. In Claribel's "Children's Voices," and "Caller Herrin," Mme. Sainton was heard to the special advantage becoming the occasion; and in all she earned applause, recalls, and scores that most emphatically marked the approbation and sympathy of her audience. In fine, let us say that worthy of Mme. Sainton's public career was her leaving it.

"Truth will stand when a' things failin'," declares the Scotch ditty with which Mme. Sainton made her final bow; and the line serves to remind us that, though the artist has quitted the platform, the truth of her example and precept may still guide her successors. "Go home, Mme. Sainton," observed Rosini, after hearing the English contralto sing a Handelian air—"go home, and teach others to phrase like yourself." It is to be hoped that, in the capacity indicated by the illustrious composer, Mme. Sainton will for many years serve the cause of art; but, anyhow, she will enjoy in her retirement the esteem of the public, to whom she has been such a faithful servant.

A Nilsson Concert and How a New York Soprano Enjoyed it.

(Correspondence of the Springfield Republican).

New York, Saturday, Oct. 1.

I have been to hear Nilsson, and I am constrained to write to somebody about it. To hear the Nightingale who is enchanting the new world after compelling the homage of the old, was to me an event worth recording. I remember, when music was just opening some of her temple doors to me, what a grievous grief it was to my soul when I missed hearing Jenny Lind. How I hungered and thirsted after her! The divinest priestess of that holy place she has ever remained in my imagination, though I have since heard many of the world's acknowledged great ones in musical art. The wonderful vocalism and clear elocution of Sontag are still fresh in my memory. Then the conscientious, thorough and powerful Lagrange; the thrilling and terrible Penno, who almost paralyzed the French critics with her great Italian passion; the unrivalled Titiens; the pyrotechnical Patti (Carlotta) and the marvellous little Adelina; and how I have luxuriated in the large, classical, ever-satisfying sostenuto of Parepa. But all these with the hosts of other lesser lights,—the Piccolominis, the Gazzanigas, the Kelloggs, etc., were forgotten, they and their works together, at Steinway hall, yesterday afternoon.

The newspaper accounts have been somewhat conflicting, and there has been no tumult of yore about the "divine Jenny;" nor has there been any of the enthusiasm which has prevailed when some lesser artists have appeared among us; so one can hear Nilsson unprejudiced and judge of her unbiased. Yesterday, I took my place among the large audience in a more passive state than I remember being in on any occasion of the kind. I did not expect to be astonished nor to be overwhelmingly delighted, though one could but expect a great musical feast from such a combination of crowned talent.

The orchestra, made up of familiar faces and instruments, was led by the heroic Maresek, grown gray in the service of an exacting public and spoiled prima donnas. The impresario wields his baton with the slightest movement compatible with marking the time, but concentrating in his short, unobtrusive motions the most surprising amount of nervous energy and magnetic command. I did not discover the black eye and pummeled nose that the notorious R. R. R-g-e is said to have given him, but I could not help regarding the veteran dealer in high art with new respect when recalling the figure of the wholesale merchant in low art at the Grand Opera house. The failures of Max to get rich out of the magnificent material with which he has been enriching the public these twenty years, became honorable in comparison with the personal successes of him who robs the public and degrades its morals with his diabolical "Temptations."

The gay overture to "Fra Diavolo" always puts one in fine spirits, and it was yesterday exhilarating in its freshness and completeness of rendering. The old favorite tenor Brignoli, and the new baritone Verger seemed very acceptable to the audience in the popular duet from "Bolisario," but the new singer seemed to me wonderfully like Sydney Smith's dog, "extrordinary orary," while Brignoli has certainly a voice of delicious sweetness and power, with a genuine Italian warmth in his tone; his art (tell it not in Gath) is sometimes poor, and on this occasion I was sorry to hear the same old conventional tricks that we've all outgrown. Our new American contralto, Miss Anna Louise Cary, brings an effective voice, a good school and an agreeable person—a combination of pleasant things. The quality of her voice, with all due deference to the critic who pronounced it Italian, is nevertheless American. It is like hundreds of voices in New England, with the added grace of culture. It reminds one slightly of Miss Phillips, though it is less powerful, and less distinguished in quality, and possesses none of the dramatic element of that artist's voice. She sang the great contralto song from "Semiramide," showing excellent ability in vocalization; but when encored, "Kathleen Mavourneen" was rendered with rather ordinary style and expression. Miss Cary is a blonde and good looking, not in her "premiere jeunesse," certainly, but young enough to achieve still more in art than she has already done.

Vieuxtemps, the king of the violin! At his feet I should lay down my pen. Such poetry breathes from under his enchanted fingers! What delicacy! What wonders of execution! How flowing the cantabile, how crisp the staccato, how swift the coruscating scales! What an amazing amount of ornamentation always subordinated to the main musical idea! The strong, pure, human-like tones—all these wonders one must hear to conceive. Of the performance of Miss Anna Mehlig on the piano forte, I who am not a great lover of that instrument can only say, her delightful music made me forget both performer and piano, a pleasure not often experienced in listening to that unpoetical instrument.

So much for the magnificent concomitants; but, great and satisfactory as they were, the centre of desire, the acme of enjoyment must of course be Nilsson. And what shall I say of her? Some persons have expressed disappointment in her. A lady who sat next me said, "I heard her in Paris; she is not comparable with Adelina Patti." Fourth or fifth on the programme she came, a tall, graceful figure, apparently unfettered by whalebones, dressed in a flesh-colored silk, court train, with blue and white striped satin petticoat, corsage à la Pompadour and coat sleeves. Her blonde hair was arranged in a large coil of braids, not high above her forehead, nor low on her neck, but at a point admirably suiting the contour of her finely shaped head. Her face as she turned toward the strong light was lovely indeed, an expression of almost ineffable sweetness, harmonizing with a simplicity and unconsciousness of manner, wholly charming. This was Nilsson as I surveyed her from my distant point, waiting breathlessly for the finishing of the organ, piano, and flute prelude to Gounod's beautiful "Ave Maria." The opening phrase of the song "Ave Maria" was so softly delivered that for a moment I questioned whether my great distance from the stage did not produce an effect not intended by the singer; but as the soft, sweet notes followed in the melody, clear and perfect, I began to feel the power of perfectly musical tones. Refinement and delicacy, combined with a penetration which makes it omnipresent, were the first apparent qualities of this wonderful voice; but as the song went on and the earnestness of the prayer increased, the volume of those sweet sounds grew to a surprising power, at the same time losing none of their unique beauty. Here was a perfect voice; but it seemed to me that a reverent use had made this perfectness. The fine gift of nature had not been sacrificed in a reckless straining after startling effects, but conscientious care had resulted in absolute purity of tone. I thought her conception highly intelligent; her expression is not passionate but spiritual. In the familiar song from "Lucia di Lammermoor" one finds a new quality, as though the character had become clothed with higher attributes than we had known before. The strong Italian fervor of mere passion I believe Nilsson does not possess; hers is rather intellectual and spiritual. In "The Last Rose of Summer" there was a tenderness combined with this elevated quality, which made it supremely lovely.

Her roulades, trills and all accessory ornamentation are given with exceeding clearness and beauty. There is indeed "not one unpleasant tone in her voice." Loud or soft, high or low, her entire range is mellifluous as a flute. In the song, with flute accompaniment, where she sings sometimes in unison and sometimes in harmony with that instrument, her tones were the sweeter, though she was doubtless accompanied by a master. In short, to one entranced with this dear nightingale, she seemed, indeed, as she curved her neck gracefully toward her shoulder, and leaned in a marked manner toward the stage, like some pure bird informed with intelligence, pouring out for us coarser mortals a new strain of divine melody.

CRYSTAL PALACE SATURDAY CONCERTS.—The fifteenth series, to commence on Saturday the first of October, will comprise twenty-six concerts—twelve before and fourteen after Christmas—the first concert of the second portion to take place on the 21st of January, and the last on the 22nd of April. The performances will be conducted by Mr. Manns, whose benefit concert will be held on the 29th April. The band and chorus will be the same as during last season, and the programmes selected on the same principles. That the same standard work of the great masters will be performed with all possible care, new works of importance brought forward when practicable, and every endeavor made to maintain the reputation of the Crystal Palace Concerts, may be taken for granted.

The present year being the hundredth year of the anniversary of the birth of Beethoven (born at Bonn on the 17th December, 1770), a more than usual prominence is to be given to his works in the first twelve concerts of the series. It is intended to perform the nine symphonies, with such overtures, concertos, and other compositions, vocal and orchestral, as can be conveniently introduced; and that all which intimate acquaintance, affectionate study, and careful rehearsal can do will be done to put these immortal works before the subscribers in a fuller and finer light even than hitherto, and thus to do honor to the memory of the great master, may safely be counted on in advance. On one of the Saturdays the performance is to consist of Fidelio, in English, produced in the new theatre.

THE FIRST "FLORESTAN." The Orchestra of Sept. 30, has the following:

In our obituary of to-day we chronicle the death of one who formed one of the last few links that still bind us to the classical period of music. The name of Joseph Augustus Roedel is well known in the musical world in connection with the first introduction of the masterpieces of German opera into this country, whilst its owner's intimate friendship with Beethoven, and the fact of his having been the original Florestan in "Fidelio," are matters of history, which will ensure a short sketch of his life being interesting to our musical readers.

Born August 28th, 1783, in Neuburg vorm Wald, in the Upper Palatinate, and originally destined for the Church, the subject of our memoir enjoyed a classical education, which stood him in good need when, in his twentieth year, he exchanged theology for a diplomatic career, and entered the service of the then Elector of Bavaria as Secretary of Legation at Salzburg. At the breaking out of the war between Bavaria and Austria in 1804, and the subsequent recall of the Salzburg Legation, young Roedel accepted a tempting offer from the Impresario of the Court theatre at Vienna (who had heard him sing at an amateur operatic performance) to fulfil an engagement as primo tenore at the Imperial Opera. His success at Vienna was so great as to determine him to adopt definitively the operatic career, and it was at the commencement of this (in the summer of 1805) that his assumption, and indeed "creation," of the part of Florestan in "Fidelio" gained him the friendship of Beethoven, a friendship which lasted until the great composer's death.

In 1823 Francis the First appointed Roedel to the professorship of singing at the Imperial Opera, and in this capacity the excellence of his method was demonstrated by a list of distinguished pupils, foremost amongst whom was the celebrated Henrietta Sontag. In 1828 Roedel obeyed a call to Aix-la-Chapelle as Director of the Opera, and in the following year he conceived and executed the idea of introducing German opera into Paris by means of a complete German personale.

In consequence of the great success of this venture—the electric effect produced by his chorus being particularly remarkable—our director remained in Paris until 1832, when he was induced by Monk Mason, the then Impresario of the Italian Opera at the King's Theatre, to try the same experiment in London.

Many of our readers will doubtless remember the enthusiasm evoked by this first introduction of German opera to the metropolis, and the profound impression created by the first representation of "Fidelio," "Der Freischütz," and other—then novel—masterpieces of the German school, with a cast including Schröder-Devrient as prima donna, Haitzinger as primo tenore, and the great Hummel (Roedel's brother-in-law) as conductor.

In 1835 Professor Roedel retired from operatic life, but continued his career of musical usefulness in this, his adopted country, for many years after; indeed, it was not until 1853 that he finally returned to his native land to enjoy the well-earned fruits of his active and eventful life.

On the 19th inst., at the ripe age of 87, our old friend gently fell asleep, bearing with him the affectionate remembrance of all those who had been fortunate enough to become acquainted with his kindly, genial disposition, and to appreciate his high moral worth.

ALFRED NICHOLSON. The Athenæum pays the following tribute to a gentleman with whom we once had the pleasure to ride from Birmingham to London (it was after the Musical Festival of 1861, in which he had borne part in the orchestra), and whose conversation, full of refined taste and of intelligent interest alike in art and in the advanced thought of the age we remember still with pleasure.

The obituary of last week records the recent death, at Leicester, of Mr. Alfred Nicholson, aged forty-eight, after his having for some years been withdrawn from public duty by a wearing and hopeless illness. The choice of his instrument—the oboe—is one which may be said to limit the player to orchestral or concerted performances; but in these the excellence and value of Mr. Nicholson were well known, and honorable to his master, M. Barret. As a man, he was of a genial nature,—one who cherished refined tastes and fancies, besides those of his own art: in brief, belonging to the company of contemporary English players, who, so far as manners and culture are concerned, have most acceptably replaced those of the preceding generation in this country. The sufferings of his last years were kindly ministered to, and, as far as possible, alleviated by his friends and comrades in art. But this was no exception to a well-known rule. The unobtrusive kindness and liberality of musician to brother musician, in the hour of trial and decay, cannot be over-estimated, and should never be forgotten by those protesting against the ascetics, happily diminishing in number, who have been used to decry a gracious and lovely art as one which necessarily demoralizes its professors.

VIENNA.—The Beethoven Centenary Festival will commence on the 16th December next. The following is the programme:—Friday, the 16th December, Fidelio; Saturday, the 17th, afternoon, in the rooms of the Society of the Friends of Music, grand concert, comprising:—Prologue; Ninth Symphony; Playing by Mmo. Schumann and Mme. Gompertz-Bettelheim; Sunday, the 18th, morning, in the same locality, Missa Solemnis; evening, grand banquet; Monday, the 19th, morning, in the same locality, Concert of Chamber Music; evening, at the Imperial Theatre, Egmont.—Among the Beethoven MSS. in the library of the Society of the Friends of Music, there are the fragments of a Violin Concerto with orchestra accompaniment. The introductory movement is completed, and a large part of the Allegro; quite enough, in fact—at least so say competent judges, or those who consider themselves as such, to give an idea what was the plan of the whole work.

Acting upon this suggestion, Herr Hellmesberger intends completing this torso and then having it performed. Herr Hellmesberger is a clever man, and might, so thinks the humble paragraphist who pens these lines, employ himself more profitably and more sensibly. If Herr Hellmesberger wants a new pair of shoes—the said paragraphist is now indulging in a little sportive allegory—let him have a new pair, but whatever he does let him not attempt to step into a pair of Beethoven's. He would find them horribly too big for him.—London Mus. World.

MUSIC IN GERMANY. A "rambling Correspondent" of Musical World writes:

Opera in Germany, except in Austria, is now but little heard. Sunday is the principal day for the performance of the lyric drama. On the other days plays national in their expression are chiefly given. In Vienna the Stuttgart tenor, Herr Heinrich Sontheim, and the Berlin tenor, Herr Wachtel, have been starring. There is an excellent local tenor in Herr Wathen, who is not, however, such a powerful singer as either Sontheim or Wachtel, both of whom, like Duprez and Tamberlik, have any number of high chest C's at command. Mr. Adams, the English tenor who sang at Covent Garden Theatre, has left Vienna. Miss Minnie Hauck is engaged at Vienna. In Berlin the Operahouse frequenters are anxiously waiting for the return of Pauline Lucca, who went to Pont-a-Mousson (France) to nurse her wounded husband, the Baron Von Rahden. Frau Harriette-Wippen and Fräulein Lehmann are the leading prime donne. The former is known in London; the latter is likely to find her way there—she can act as well as sing. There is a Swedish tenor, Herr Arnoldson, who has made a favorable impression in Berlin as Count Almaviva. Herr Niemann is, however, the great magnet of attraction; he is perhaps now the most declamatory tenor in Europe. Fräulein Muzell has appeared with success as Gabriele in Kreutzer's Das Nachtlager zu Grenada. Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia has been revived in Berlin, and is, of course, as a martial opera most liked. The soprano part was originally written for Jenny Lind, who was to have sung it in English at Drury Lane Theatre, but broke her engagement to appear at Her Majesty's Theatre, for which a jury gave Mr. Bunn £2,500 damages. In the Prussian capital patriotic airs and part songs have been in the ascendant. Herr Taubert and Herr Eckert have composed national appeals; but the music of all this style of music is pitched in one key—there is a sameness which becomes monotonous. Heard from a marching regiment, some of the melodies are stirring enough. The old German repertory is unusually rich in national airs, and there is not a town in which a kapellmeister or director is to be found who is not contributing a new work; but the Wacht am Rhein maintains its supremacy. Was blasen die Trompeten of Arndt (1813) is often heard, as, of course, Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland, also Arndt. Taubert's Vorwärts, Vorwärts is exciting enough. Dr. F. Hiller's Zur Wehre is also a soldier's stimulant. As for the Siegesmarsch, the compositions for the pianoforte are innumerable with names of all the localities where battles have been fought. Whilst music is thus brought to bear to stir up the nation, artists are at work night and day to produce prints of the feats of arms of the Germans. Portraits, photographic and otherwise, appear of all the generals, the royal ones in the ascendant, of course. But not the least curious of these art publications are the caricatures which are to be seen in the windows of every kind of shop in all the leading towns. Some of these prints are of a coarse kind, but the majority are sufficiently droll, and as they were published prior to the precipitate downfall of Imperialism in France, no particular objection could be made for the German humorists to present the Bonapartes in a ridiculous point of view, especially as the example had been set in Paris. Cologne, Sept. 17. C. ### Symphony Concerts.

The Harvard Musical Association announces its Sixth Season of ten concerts. They will begin, with most encouraging auspices, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 3, at half past three o'clock, as heretofore. The subscription for season tickets is larger than ever before: showing that neither the raising of the price, nor the formidable competition of the Thomas Orchestra, nor the Nilsson coming the same week, has rendered these concerts any the less indispensable to the lovers of good music. The plan of a Public Rehearsal, on the Tuesday before each concert, has been adopted with the hope that it may not only help those who attend the concerts to appreciate the Symphonies, &c., more by hearing them twice over, but also that it may add to the emolument of the musicians, who will receive whatever profit may arise from the rehearsals.

We give, below, the programmes of the ten concerts, so far as they have been determined. The Symphony, however, which is set down for the ninth concert, is contingent on the arrival of the music which has been ordered from Vienna, where it would have to be copied from the manuscript score. It will be seen that the whole series of programmes pivots upon BEETHOVEN, and the centennial anniversary of the great composer's birth. The first and last concerts, as well as that occurring on the 15th of December, two days before the birthday, are to be mainly or entirely of his music. The Choral Fantasia of that fourth concert will be but the prelude to the performance of the Ninth or Choral Symphony, in the production of which, a day or two later, the Harvard Association will unite with the Handel and Haydn Society. And, in accordance with the plan suggested by the Committee of the Harvard, that whole week will be filled with Beethoven Concerts given by the several musical Societies, Clubs and individual artists of our city.

The programmes here given offer three of Beethoven's Symphonies, three of his Concertos for the piano, seven of his Overtures (including all the four to Fidelio or Leonore); the Choral Fantasia, vocal selections from his great opera, &c. The Symphonies chosen for the other concerts bear a historical relation to Beethoven; Haydn and Mozart precede the birthday concert, and Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Gade, follow in their order.

—The pieces marked with a * are given for the first time in these Concerts; those with **, for the first time in Boston.

  - 3 Eighth Symphony, in F. Beethoven.

Theodore Thomas's Concerts.

The long, rich, almost cloying feast is over. It ended with the Beethoven matinee and the miscellaneous evening concert of last Saturday. The promise of the ten programmes has been fulfilled to the letter,—to a charm. So perfect an orchestra, under such quiet, admirable control, Boston knew not until Thomas came. Whatever was presented, whether symphony or waltz, things classical or of "the future," strains divine or devilish (like some by Liszt), the rendering was nearly all that hearer, or composer even, could wish. The drawbacks were: first, that so many concerts should be crowded into two weeks. But it is only by playing all the time, of course, that so costly an enterprise can pay; it is like having an opera, a theatre upon one's hands. And on the other hand, exhausting as it is to listen to so much in close succession, here were opportunities which music-lovers would not willingly forego; for there was too much to be learned, as well as to be enjoyed; and every blessing costs a certain sacrifice. Another drawback was the great length of the programmes, aggravated by more or less indulgence of the encore; but this was almost unavoidable in the solution of the double problem, how to minister largely enough to classical tastes, and at the same time gratify curiosity for new composers, and offer plenty of bonnes bouches to the amusement seekers. Another was the large admixture of the strange and questionable element of modern "programme-music," the "Symphonic Poems" and what not of Liszt and Wagner. But here, too, one heartily thanks Mr. Thomas for giving us these opportunities of knowing these things at a distance, before shaking hands with them and getting committed to them in our own concert enterprises; so adequately presented, and so often, one could find out what spirit they are of, and whether he desired more acquaintance.—Shall we hint yet one other drawback,—only felt, of course, by frequent listeners? This namely: that in the very finish and perfection of such playing, where all works together smoothly like an admirable machine in perfect order,—and in the very sweetness of such blended sounds, one feels at last a something cloying, a certain drowsy, dreamy, lotus-like sensation; so that the music, with all its beauty, seems to lack life and reality. This one felt particularly sometimes in the renderings of Beethoven; it seemed as if the thing had got to be done more by heroic acts of faith, the victory to be achieved in spite of one's own imperfections and rude means, by doing greater and better than one commonly knows how. Such great work, to have life and force in it, perhaps, ought not to be done too easily. In the very automatic perfection of the execution, grown to be a habit, the intention of the music may be lost, or strike home to the hearer's heart less vividly; if the picture be too finished, the spirit will elude us. This may seem hypercriticism, but it is certainly not so intended; for Thomas's men are artists, who can enter into the soul of great music; but even artists, even men of genius, do not show their best power in the easy routine of a perfect habit. We have heard the same experience confessed by a listener to one of those admirable Stringed Quartets of the Brothers — in Germany. The same thing holds of composition; witness the complaint of sameness in so many works of Haydn and Mozart, with whom art had grown so facile and so perfect.

But to the concerts. We have already spoken of the first two,—not so fully as we wished. Of the remainder, the most interesting were the two in memory of Beethoven, when the selections were wholly from his works, and of the noblest. The first, however, was by far too long. The "Eroica" alone, what with pauses between the movements, and the over-slow tempo in which the funeral march was taken, lasted almost an hour (55 minutes)! But it was beautifully played, with such clear, fine outline in the last movements as we have not heard before. Yet sometimes was the pianissimo too soft for that hall; nor had the whole work all the life with which it sometimes has inspired us in more improvised and rougher renderings. Then came the most poetic of the Piano Concertos, that in G, of which it is enough to say here that it was played with the best skill and style and feeling of Miss ANNA MEHLIG, so delightfully accompanied that orchestra and solo instrument made up one lovely picture. The cadenzas introduced were those by Moscheles,—perhaps the best there are, only the Moscheles stands out too much before the Beethoven. The Coriolan Overture was given with true fire; that, like the Egmont, is one of the pieces in which "every note draws blood." Then came a renewal of a delight of long ago, which long ago, too, had grown hacknied and lost its charm: the famous Septet, one of the master's earlier perfect works. But by this treatment, balancing the Clarinet, Bassoon and Horn with the entire String Orchestra, and with such wonderfully fine rendering, verily it lived and breathed again a new and fresh creation. The parts selected (for the Septet is exceptionally long) were the piquant Theme and Variations, the Scherzo and Finale. The success was perfect; each variation was a new delight; how exquisite in one of them the horn part! The florid cadenza executed at once by all the first violins was certainly a rare feat, but questionable from an artistic point of view. This concert closed with the Choral Fantasia, in which the basses of the orchestra steal in upon the free "fantasia-siren" of the Piano with a whispered theme, yet big with promise of some grander thought and utterance to come, and work it up until the voices break in with a simple sort of people's tune, resembling that in the Ninth Symphony; and as the instruments and voices grow and climb together to a climax, there is more than one anticipation of the sublime effects which have before thrilled us in the Choral Symphony. The whole performance was a success; Miss Mehlig and the Orchestra were in complete rapport; and the singing by about a hundred voices from the Handel and Haydn Society, with six good soli, was highly satisfactory.—But when it came to going home, it was too near the eleventh hour!

The second Beethoven Concert (Matinée) was of more wholesome length, and programme truly admirable; to-wit:

Symphony No. 8, F. Op. 93.
Concerto for Piano No. 5, E flat, Op. 73.

Overture "König Stephan," Op. 117.
Septet. Op. 20, Theme and Variations, Scherzo and Finale. [By request.]

Overture. Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72.

The eighth Symphony, which, though often called one of the master's lighter efforts, yet shows him wearing the consummate crown of Art, and is so full of heavenly sunshine as of the after-summer of that sorely tried, that faithful and triumphant life, sounded so serene and beautiful, that one felt that it must have been composed on just such a golden, rare October day as that on which we listened. It was a work fitted to show the finest qualities of the Thomas Orchestra. Never have we heard the Tempo di Menuetto and Trio rendered so clearly, although the tempo might have been still slower to advantage; and the fairy, evanescent, swift finale went to a charm, as well as the deliberate "clock"-like Allegretto. Miss Mehlig, if that were any longer possible, surprised us by her triumphant reproduction of the glories of the E-flat Concerto. The "King Stephen" Overture is but a slight patchwork (for Beethoven) of what seem popular Hungarian themes, yet very bright and pleasing. The Septet colors stood well. The great Leonore Overture was indeed a splendid triumph of the orchestra; we have heard them play it before when the fire and soul seemed somewhat smothered; but this time it burned brightly and with full, inspiring power.

—Here we are out short. Of all the rest next time.

The many friends of Miss ANNA LOUISE CARY will welcome her return at the Music Hall on Friday, Nov. 4, the first Nilsson Concert in this city. Having received careful training in Europe, she will no doubt realize the hopes of which her full rich voice gave such abundant promise. We are glad to notice that notwithstanding the overshadowing influence of so great an artiste as Nilsson, our Boston contralto has achieved a marked success, and elicited warm praise in New York and Philadelphia. She will be the guest of Mr. Lyman W. Wheeler during her stay in the city.

WORCESTER COUNTY MUSICAL CONVENTION.—We abridge the following from the Palladium of Wednesday:

The Convention held last week, at Mechanics' Hall, was superior in character to any of previous years, and more largely attended. The first of the week was allotted to the study of Handel's oratorio of "Samson," Schumann's "Gipsy Life," and some miscellaneous choruses, with one hour of each afternoon set apart for the "matinée." The first concert was given on Wednesday evening, with a programme of miscellaneous selections, under the direction of Mr. C. P. Morrison, author of "The Festival Hymn," with which the concert began. It is a composition of much merit. Handel's fifth concerto, organ solo, received masterly treatment at the hands of Mr. Eugene Thayer. Mr. B. D. Allen's anthem, "And he showed me a pure river," was a source of deep, serene enjoyment. Admirably arranged as a quartet, semi-chorus, and chorus, his rare musical abilities were put in requisition, and the beautiful ensemble proves that we have a composer of rare merit in our midst. An interesting feature of the programme was the Miserere from "Il Trovatore," sung by Miss Tarr and Mr. Richards, with an effective distant chorus of male voices. Mr. Edwin B. Story performed, with splendid execution, a piano solo of Liszt's, proving himself an accomplished pianist. The several choruses of the evening were finely given, with solos creditably performed by Mrs. Allen, Mrs. Munroe, and Messrs. Richards, Thompson and Barnabee.

The second concert, on Thursday evening, was a miscellaneous one of much variety in matter and manner. Mme. Bishop made her first appearance in Worcester for twenty-five years. Her voice has been wonderfully preserved, and competent critics assert that, in this period of time, it has lost nothing of its purity and freshness. Certainly, her singing was most enjoyable, artistic, finished to the last degree, and imbued with true expression. Schumann's "Gypsy Life" was most acceptable. Full of the spicy fragrance of the woods, fresh and free as the wild life it chanted, it formed a series of musical pictures which were not to be forgotten. The Mendelssohn part song, "Farewell to the Forest," was very well sung. The chorus on this evening was quite fairly balanced, the sopranos exceeding the other parts; however, Mr. Zerrahn's arrangement of tenors and basses in the centre, sopranos and altos on the wings, was an evident improvement on the old method.

The third concert was given on Friday afternoon, by the Boston Orchestral Union and the solo-singers of the week. The hall was filled by an attentive and generally appreciative audience, including the five hundred chorus singers to whom the concert was not the least beneficial part of the week's instruction. The leading feature of the programme was Mozart's Symphony in D major, which seemed in perfect accord with the sweet sunshine of the beautiful October day. The orchestra proved remarkably effective for one of twenty-four members. Especially was this true in their performance of the Air and Gavotte, by Bach. The Oboe overture was heard with delight, and the Verspiel from the opera of Mefistofele was favorably received. The vocal triumph of the afternoon, and to us, of the week, was Dr. Guilmette's singing of "It is enough," from Eljah. Mme. Bishop sang "Angels ever bright and fair," as we have never before heard it. This, too, was something for life-time remembrance. Mr. Simpson sang "If with all your hearts," with much power and with good method, bating his too great partiality for portamento. The well-known Linda duet, sung by the two latter vocalists, produced a storm of applause.

At the closing concert, on Friday evening, Handel's great oratorio of "Samson" was brought out, before an immense audience, who gave more than usual attention throughout the evening. The choruses, as a whole, were well given. There was occasionally a want of promptness, and at times a little wavering; but the success derived from a winter's study of so great a work, cannot be expected from only five days' practice; and making due allowance, the oratorio was grandly given. The soloists, comprising the three great stars of the week, were very fine. Mme. Bishop, as Delilah, was magnificent; and her rendering of "Let the Bright Seraphim," a triumph. Her high tones were as clear and telling as clarion notes, and her whole soul being in the music, she seemed electrified and inspired. Mr. Simpson did nobly; his wonderful voice, under perfect control, brought out the music of Samson's role as few real tenors can. His sympathetic tones went far toward making the music effective. Dr. Guilmette, rendered the bass airs and recitatives with that refined, artistic expression, so characteristic of his singing; in fine voice, with his faultless phrasing, perfect intonation, and finished style, the music of Harapha was finely given. Mrs. Munroe performed the music assigned her much better than could be expected in so trying a position; being obliged all the week, to sing against her wishes, she could not do herself the credit that she might desire. The accompaniments of the Orchestral Union were highly effective, and the organ, in the skilful hands of Mr. Allen, did noble service.

Miss Cushman's Last Gift to the Music Hall.

Miss Charlotte Cushman has added to the many obligations under which she has already placed the art-loving public of Boston by sending over two new busts and medallions by Mathieu, to be placed with her other gifts in the Boston Music Hall. These busts, which are of Gluck and Mendelssohn, will be placed on each side of those already mounted at the back of the hall. The medallions have been slightly injured in transportation by careless packing, but the beauty of their design and execution is apparent at a glance. The first, which is to accompany the Gluck bust, consists of a group of figures, the central and most prominent being a half-draped figure, nude to the waist, surrounded by three boys, one of whom grasps a serpent in his extended hand. The group is spirited and full of action. The drapery is particularly graceful, and the whole effect is light, free and sensuous. The bust of Gluck is a work of great artistic merit, the strongly marked features being admirably brought out. The second medallion has suffered more than the first, and its reconstruction will require some little time. It consists of three draped figures, the middle one holding a lyre in one hand while the other arm is extended as though about to strike its chords. In spite of the action which the attitude of this whole group expresses, the effect produced is one of sweet repose and harmony. The bust which is to rest on this support is a beautiful and faithful portrait of Mendelssohn, doing full justice to the delicacy and refinement of the great composer's face, but at the same time showing strength and vigor. Accompanying these last gifts comes a small bust of Miss Cushman herself. We feel that we are giving utterance to the sentiment of the best portion of our community when we say that it is a duty that Boston owes its famous daughter to give this bust an honorable and conspicuous position in the hall Miss Cushman has done so much to adorn.—Eve. Gazette.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, OCT. 13.—Since my former communication, now a long time ago, we have had almost a stagnation here in musical matters. The present season opened vigorously, however, and the promise is highly encouraging that our musical delights will this year be more and better than ever before.

First on the list comes the ENGLISH OPERA COMBINATION, which, as you know, embraces the best talent of the two companies of last season, except the omission of Mr. and Mrs. Rosa. What was plain enough to me last year, namely, that Carl Rosa was an excellent orchestra conductor, bringing everything to an unusually fine degree of finish (that is for an opera orchestra), is very painfully impressed upon me now when I hear the present orchestra under Mr. Behrens. From what I have seen of this gentleman's efforts, I am impressed with the conviction that he is at once deficient in ability quickly to perceive a shortcoming (especially if it occur in an inner voice), wanting in a certain inspiration of command, without which there is no great leader, and lacking in obstinate assertion of his own dignity as Conductor, which ought to make him refuse to go before the public with insufficient rehearsal, on account of the necessary damage to his own reputation (if no higher artistic motive moves him). The orchestral material seems good enough and of passable size; there are about thirty pieces.

To the singers much commendation may be given. The troupe embraces Mrs. Ritchings-Bernard and Miss Rose Hersee, sopranos; Mrs. Zaida Seguin and Mrs. Bowler, altos; Messrs. Wm. Castle and Brookhouse Bowler, tenors; Mr. Alberto Lawrence, baritone; Messrs. S. C. Campbell and Henry Drayton, basses. Besides there are a half dozen or so for accessory parts. The chorus is about the same as that of the Parepa-Rosa troupe last year. The costumes are better, since the present wardrobe combines both those of last year.

The musical management is entirely in the hands of Mrs. Bernard. Of this very superior woman I have a number of things to say, commendatory and otherwise. As a manager she is very efficient. Her energy is unbounded. If she is lacking, it is in that abundant physique which enabled Parepa to laugh at fatigue, and make her appearance at rehearsal, as a rule, in a state of good humor that of itself went far to cause everything to move smoothly. As a singer she has certain mannerisms of holding her head and wrinkling her forehead; and unexpected and unaccountable pianissimos, which have only the effect to create the impression that the singer has fallen through for an instant, but no doubt will presently emerge. Her taste, also, is better in the dramatic than the lyric, and leads her to prefer heavy parts in which her want of adequate voice becomes too apparent. As an actress she is, of course, infinitely beyond Parepa, yet there was a charm in the simple presence of that great prima donna that with the public is more winning than the most elaborate art. Mrs. Bernard shows one intention in the execution of which I bid her God-speed. It is to remove the prompt box from the centre of the stage, and prompt from the wings, as in the drama. In all the operas performed chiefly by her old troupe, this is done. The Parepa singers, however, seem somewhat wedded to the Italian notion. Miss Hersee is as bright and charming as ever, though she has once or twice sung false this year. Mrs. Seguin is an extreme favorite with our public, and both sings and acts charmingly. Mrs. Bowler has improved in her method of using her really superior voice, and is a growing favorite with the public. Mr. Castle sings even better than last year, and is still more the adored of the ladies. He shows a decided improvement in action and stage presence. Mr. Bowler you know as well as I do. Mr. Lawrence has the misfortune to have parts, very few of which are high enough to suit the best registers of his voice. But whatever he does he does well, and his singing is highly appreciated by our public. Indeed I think it would be difficult to find a singer whose vocal delivery is more irreproachable than this. Campbell, also, has improved, using his beautiful voice with very little of the unpleasant nasal element of which I complained last year. He also shows more ease of action, although I still adhere to my opinion that nature intended him for a Presbyterian preacher. And so at last I come to the greatest actor in the troupe, Mr. Henry Drayton, whose mastery of the art of personation is more perfect than that of any singer I have ever happened to see on the stage, except, perhaps, Miss Adelaide Phillips. Mr. Drayton has appeared as Count Arnheim, Beppo (in Fra Diavolo), Marcel (Huguenots), Rebboledo (Crown Diamonds), and Germont (Traviata), and in every one has reached a complete and distinctive success.

The repertory this season is exceedingly varied. In fourteen representations here they have given thirteen different operas; viz: "Trovatore," "Mariana," "Crown Diamonds," "Fra Diavolo," "Huguenots," "Bohemian Girl," "Martha," "Faust," "Traviata," "Marriage of Figaro," "Lurline," "Postillion of Longjumeau," and "Rose of Castile."

Brookhouse Bowler made a good success as Don Cesar de Bazan (in Mariana), but his well-fed, inexpressive face, and his boisterous method of singing unfit him for pathetic parts. All the performances were somewhat imperfectly rehearsed, an inevitable result when a new opera is given every night; but by the time the troupe gets to Boston (which will be about December 8), these shortcomings will be done away, and I have no doubt you will find the result even more gratifying than last season.

The financial affairs are in the hands of C. D. Hess & Co., who so successfully conducted those of the Parepa troupe last year. I am glad to say that the business here has been excellent.

Our other musical sensations I must defer till another letter, except to mention that our Oratorio Society will give Elijah about December 1st, and that Mr. Dudley Buck is giving a series of organ recitals of the first of which I enclose a programme:

Sonata, No. 4, in B flat.....Mendelssohn.
Allegro con Brio. Andante Religioso. Allegretto.
Larghetto, from the 4th Quartet.....Mozart.
Bourrée and Double, from the 2nd Sonata for Violin.
Transcribed by Beethoven.....J. S. Bach.
Adagio Religioso.....F. Liszt.
Theme and Variations, from the "Serenade for Stringed Instruments." Op. 8.....Beethoven.
Spring Song and Romance, from Op. 68.....Schumann.
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber.

These promise to be a great advantage to our studious organists, for Mr. Buck's repertory is almost unbounded, and he draws freely from the best and rarest, to give artistic value to these recitals. Mr. Creswell is also giving a series of Sunday afternoon recitals, but as he confines himself to popular selections, chiefly, I hardly need send a programme. There appears to me, however, a question of taste in giving concerts for money in a church Sabbath afternoons.

One of our German societies gives a Beethoven Festival Oct. 25th, producing the Fifth Symphony, Choral Fantasia, etc., under direction of Mr. Grosscurth. The other society have a grand Festival in December, producing the Ninth Symphony, Fidelio, and several other of the greatest works. The whole under Mr. Hans Balatka.

Now, Mr. Editor, for my long letter I can offer only the excuse the boy gave for the long composition,—I got to writing and it wouldn't stop.

The Intellectual Influence of Music.

(From the Atlantic Monthly for November.)

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

Whatever doubt exists concerning the intellectual influence of music is chiefly due either to its alleged vagueness in comparison with speech, or to its emotional and sensuous qualities, so seemingly opposed to the calm temper and "pale hue" of thought.

What does it mean? (Sonate que veux-tu?) is asked after a fine sonata, symphony, or song without words, commonly by some one who has not enjoyed it, and who is not musical. It would be hard to tell him, and the interpretations of a dozen really sincere enthusiasts, stirred by it to the bottom of their hearts, and fed as with heavenly manna, would be widely apart. The truth is, the meaning of music lies hidden in those deep, mysterious springs of every day experience, which it were as vain to ignore as it is impossible to render into words. Music is finer than speech, and makes its appeal to a deeper somewhat in us underlying all thoughts of the understanding. Music expresses that part of our best and inmost consciousness, which needs such sympathetic, fluid, one might almost say electric, language as its tones alone afford. For it begins where speech leaves off; through it the inmost spirit—all that is inexpressible and yet of most account in us—can give sign of itself. Hence the loftiest poetry, the most inspired and subtle charm of conversation, in short, that magical something which distinguishes the utterances of genius in its high hour, in whatsoever form, is analogous to music and sets the fine chords vibrating in somewhat the same way. The higher ranges of Coleridge's conversation are described by his nephew, in the Preface to the "Table-Talk," in terms which one might use who had been sitting under the spell of Mendelssohn or Chopin: "I have seen him at times when you could not incarnate him,—when he shook aside your petty questions or doubts, and burst with some impatience through the obstacles of common conversation. Then, escaped from the flesh, he would soar upwards into an atmosphere almost too rare to breathe, but which seemed proper to him, and there he would float at ease. Like enough, what Coleridge then said his subtlest listener would not understand as a man understands a newspaper; but upon such a listener there would steal an influence, and an impression, and a sympathy; there would be a gradual attempering of his body and spirit, till his total being vibrated with one pulse alone, and thought became merged in contemplation:—

"And so, his senses gradually wrapt
In a half-sleep, he'd dream of better worlds,
And dreaming hear thee still, O singing lark,
That sangest, like an angel in the clouds!"

Did you never step within the portal of a vast and crowded church in the hour of prayer? In vain you sought to catch the syllables of the far-off, pale, spiritual-looking man. What if you could not hear them? You heard him; his tones, his spirit, took possession of your spirit, till, losing thought of self, it went up with the rest. Of that sort is the eloquence, the influence of music. Nothing does more for culture than the personal presence, the magnetic sphere as it were which one in whom the spirit and result of higher culture are embodied bears about with him. The presence of good music is the presence of a good spirit. The presence of deep and earnest music is essentially the presence of the deep and earnest spirit who composed it,—a presence felt more surely than his words or looks could be. There is frivolous, idle music, and there is pedantic music. There is also music, more than one mind may compass, which is altogether the outpouring of the hopes, the prayers, the faith, the very lives of men like Handel, Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven. It is good to have them with us; and in no way could we have them so near as in their undying harmonies, not so evanescent but that generation after generation can recall them, all alive and new as if they never had been heard before. Music is an expression of character, of the moods, the spirit, the meaning of the man that makes it. His words can only tell the meaning of his thoughts; his actions the meaning of his present purpose; his music tells the meaning of him. Through one symphony you get a clearer insight into a being like Beethoven than through any life of him that could be written. Not much acquaintance can you have with Bach or Mozart through biographies, unless you know their music and can read that, all the while, between the lines.

Music has an atmospheric influence. In earliest childhood such influence is felt. The very infant is affected by it; we care not that he understand or even seem to heed or listen. And each composer's music is a peculiar atmosphere, as much so as the atmosphere of the woods or fresh fields. The sensibilities, the character, the tone of feeling, the aspirations, the habitual consciousness of the child, will be affected by it, and all his after-life be redolent of it. Beethoven or Mozart may be introduced as an invisible presiding genius over his earliest education, before other teachers can begin to reach him, or any thoughts shall have begun to shape themselves in his unconscious mind.

All very well, you say, in theory; but look at facts and persons. Were your musical classmates, are your musical friends and neighbors, are the musicians of your town, distinguished as a class for intellectuality? How many of your great tone-masters, even, seem to be persons of no culture! How little they can talk on intellectual, moral, social topics! How innocent of all book knowledge, and how helpless in high conversation! And so on.

Yet we could give instances where, could you know the persons nearly and what spirit they are of, you might be forced to own that more music may serve as a virtual equivalent for other culture,—holding in itself much other culture in solution as it were. For there we seem to have the essence of it all. You will note sometimes in the simplest remark of one of these thoroughly musical natures, one of these so steeped in harmonies, but ignorant of books, and so unused to cultivated circles,—nay, in a mere smile or lighting of the eye or least expression of the face,—how right to the heart and centre of a thought their quick instinct, intuition, strikes, how they see the gist of the matter in anticipation of the hint. For, somehow, in fine music they have been baptized into the spirit of the highest thought, without the tedious intervention of the letter and the syllogism. The musical soul is gifted with a rare divining power. If the best of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, has passed into one, and there become assimilated with his inmost life and individuality, what culture can he lack that would seem rich enough to covet in exchange for this! And all the more by virtue of this one unspeakable possession (whether he possesses or is possessed), will he be sensitively open, heart and mind, to every hint of truth and beauty in nature, in poetry and art, in history, philosophy, or science. Preoccupied with one, as every earnest person must be in his way with something, does he renounce his birthright to the rest?

But let us not admit too much, since other culture is not hard to find in men who live for the most part in music.

During these last years, if not before, the reading world has had occasion to become acquainted with a goodly number of musicians who also were good writers and good talkers. Not a few of them have written books, and successful ones, though some of them may never have intended it. Mendelssohn's letters, sought in all the circulating libraries, though written to familiar friends, without the slightest literary purpose, show a literary faculty, a cleverness of thought and observation, a quick and fine appreciation of what passes, quite as remarkable perhaps as the Note-Books of Hawthorne. Schumann wrote only about music, but wrote like a man of culture and a thinker, fresh, original, and rich in illustration. The letters of some earlier great composers,—Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven,—which have been dragged to light of late to gratify the craving for whatever smallest personal relic can be found of men so perfectly revealed in their creations, though not to be judged at all as literature, do certainly afford glimpses here and there into most interesting character and intellectual traits of brightness not outmatched in other spheres. The Ritter Gluck knew how to explain the æsthetic principles which lay at the foundation of his classic operas with such clear logic and such fortunate expression as the case required; and Richard Wagner, who would fain push those principles too far, finds even now far readier audience as controversial pamphleteer and critic than he does for "Lohengrin," the "Meistersinger," or the "Nibelungen" trilogy. Weber, even if he had not composed "Der Freyschütz," "Oberon," and "Euryanthe," would have won a name by his æsthetic-romantic and fantastic writings, mostly of the kind called fugitive. More lately, Ferdinand Hiller, Hector Berlioz, and Liszt have written frequently and well, each with a fascinating individuality, all in a genial vein, full of enthusiasm and of bonhomie, and with fine discrimination, showing abundant evidence of minds well stored with general knowledge, on every page betraying genuine sympathy as well as personal acquaintance with poets, artists, men of thought and genius in all spheres. A more beautiful, poetic, chivalrous, appreciative tribute to the genius and the country of a brother artist than Liszt's noble monograph on Chopin were hard to find in any literature. Even the gay, mercurial, convivial Rossini, if he wrote no books, was quoted universally for his fine wit and observation; nor did he, as Hiller reports him daily for a season, lack higher powers of thoughtful conversation. Some of the recent German musicians, who have written on the principles and method of their art, have shown themselves well versed in modern metaphysical ideas and systems; for instance, Marx and Hauptmann. Joachim, the great violinist, asked all manner of questions, with most eager interest, about our Emerson, and showed an intimate acquaintance with his works; it was the genuine response of one free, large, fearless, truthful mind to another.

And so we might go on with instances, if there were need of more to prove that the musical passion, musical genius, "inspiration," is not a kind of preternatural secretion of all the mental faculties into one unduly developed organ at the expense of all the rest, and that a man, however much absorbed in music, need not be a moral weakling or a fool, a poor "Blind Tom" in-kind, if not degree. It were a pretty problem for the idle hours of any of these doubters,—who talk so pityingly of intellectual and moral weakness as the price of musical indulgence,—to contemplate the difference between Blind Tom, and say, Sebastian Bach! Bach and Handel both, in their way, too, were totally absorbed in music,—mere musicians so far as we can know, their whole gigantic force of heart and mind and will spending itself in that direction,—only to some purpose! Greater musicians, greater men, than these who, in this more self-conscious age, write books as well as symphonies, they have left no other sign but their great music. No one will doubt the greatness or the soundness of such intellects. Beethoven and Mozart must be joined with them, giant intelligences likewise, whose whole vitality was spent in music, and without conscious literary gift, though much be found so interesting in the letters which they would have burned could they have known the curiosity and love of publication of the age to come after them. (Let us be thankful that they did not know it.) There have been giants in our own days,—Mendelssohn at least, and Schumann; but the giants of those days were greater, and they wrote not books; they were all music. Does this prove against us? On the contrary it proves that music of itself is sphere enough for the completest exercise of such sublime intelligences, nay, such grand types of character, as only find their peers in Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Raphael, Michelangelo, or Milton. There is idle lotus-eating, sickly sentimental vanity, shallow diletanteism enough in music as in other arts and literature; no less, no more; and it is even found in much which tries to fancy itself religion, spirituality, life hidden in a better world. Diletante is precisely the name that has been given to the idle, selfish, weak indulger in all or any of these spheres; but to be an artist, or even an amateur (or faithful lover), that implies some earnestness, some bending of the faculties, with strength of will, to worthy purpose.

Music a self-indulgent, pleasurable weakness, do you say? Makes a man a listless, shiftless dreamer, unfit for life's stern business, and to be counted a mere cipher by the world's self-elected governing committees? Enough to point for answer to the lives and labors of the great composers; to their sufferings, too, their willing martyrdom to the ideal of their art; their whole-souled loyalty to duty such as in the sure and strong bent of their genius God gave them to do. For this they could dispense with what the mass of men deem indispensable. Think what Bach actually did, and Handel; how Bach, in tranquil, cheerful, unambitious daily round of service, like a true priest who keeps the altar fire forever burning, tasked all his strength and mighty genius to the utmost, composing for each Sabbath in that Leipsic Thomas-Kirche, and for all the festivals besides, through six long years, a new cantata, comprising orchestral symphony, chorals, which he alone has harmonized so perfectly, elaborate choruses, and recitatives and airs for single voices, each upon a scale of magnitude equal to that of a mass, or one of the two or three parts of an oratorio, and all in the noblest and most learned style of composition,—works to live forever, yet sung then only once and laid away to be explored and published for the first time now, a century since he lived! There they lie, the manuscript scores of some three hundred of them, in the Royal Library at Berlin, any one of them a task beyond the power of any master of our own day. Think of the seemingly endless series of huge volumes of his works in all forms which the "Bach-Gesellschaft," year by year, for sixteen years now, have been bringing out, while the heap of manuscripts unedited seems scarcely yet to be diminished. And in all this not a page which a true criticism would leave out as being either trivial or commonplace; the whole of it sincere and wholesome music, the heartfelt expression of the deepest piety, and moulded in the clear, though complex and subtle forms peculiar to a loyal master mind that had attained to know and reverence the divine law and secret of all form.

Think of Handel creating all those oratorios after thirty years of intense toil in composing, rehearsing, and bringing out Italian operas at the rate of two or three each year!—Handel, a people's man, compared with Bach, who loved the light, while Bach lived in the shade, and who was much more in his element while facing the great world. Think of the brave old giant, after he grew blind, conducting the performance of his "Israel" or "Messiah" at the organ, improvising such organ accompaniment as it is scarcely within the skill of modern musicianship to replace, his huge wig vibrating, they say, with satisfaction when the whole went to his mind! Or think how Mozart consumed himself in musical creation, and did so young, apparently, only because the tree had borne all the wondrous fruit required of it, because he had fairly done the work, achieved the mission, of the longest life in five-and-thirty years! And Beethoven! What shall we say of him, writing his greatest works after he had entirely lost the sense of hearing? Was not that intellectual labor, and of the greatest kind, whether we judge it by the spiritual and mental chemistry which organized the works without the aid of sense, in him, or by their influence on the world? Schubert, Bellini, Weber, Mendelssohn, great workers all, died young; for real life and work of the purely intellectual, inspired kind are not to be measured by length of years. And the same is true in a great degree of the Di Minores, minor characters in music; this constancy of mental application, this earnest concentration of the higher faculties, is found in them; nor in composers only, but in humblest teachers, village organists, and even amateur enthusiasts.

Music may run into frivolity, may be coupled with immorality, and with sheer atheism, that makes a jest of honesty, believing in no good, as in the opera bouffe of Offenbach; but music in itself has no such tendency. It can be gay, light-hearted, droll, and set the soul free from its mortal clogs while by exquisite and graceful fancies, such as sparkle in Rossini's comic operas, but never did it wear filthy channels for itself. Hold not the art guilty of the base uses trade and luxury would put it to. Music for music's sake is one thing, is divine; "sensational" music another and of other origin; its spring is mercenary, not sincerely musical.

There is another prejudice against musicians on the score of "eccentricities," "exceptional behavior," "disappointing" personal appearance, etc. Such hopeless "impracticables"! Beethoven's "moroseness," his absent-mindedness (forgetting to order his dinner while he sat in the restaurant for hours); Handel's "huge appetite," for truly the giant had two attributes of Homer's heroes in a high degree, capacity for anger and for eating (as it were, whole hecatombs)! Absence of mind in Schumann too, and in Franz Schubert, alternating in the latter with a wild Bohemian conviviality, the great work going on within him somehow all the while; Chopin's morbid and unreasonable sensitiveness; and many more such contradictions might be named; yet really not more, we fancy, than among famous painters, sculptors, poets, psychologists, and men of science, men of business, and even some whom the pious world has sainted. But music presupposes a harmonic, truer sort of life than society has realized as yet; and so for answer we may say: These great musicians lived too early; they were prophets in their way; in actual outward life but ill at home in a world not ready for them,—a world so selfish and antagonistic. Their souls were strung up to heaven's concert pitch; it was the age, the world around them, that was false and gave out an uncertain and bewildering sound.

Schubert, they say, haunted the wine-shop; sought seclusion, sought escape from bores (whom, chiefly of all mortal ills, he dreaded), in what seemed dull and sensual leisure. There he would find free play of thought and room for shaping fancy. There, as we said, the work went on within, the new song sang itself, the symphony was growing into form. He was convivial and fond of friends, recklessly generous, "felt himself a Cæsar when he had sold a song or two." And when the generous liquor loosed his tongue, with what fearless frankness, what subtle, withering satire, he would tell pretenders to the name of artist what he thought of them! Then again he could sit dumb and vacant to appearance, quiescent, passive as an oyster. But was there not a pearl in that oyster? What if the pearl should chance to be the glorious great Symphony in C, that of the "heavenly length," as Schumann said of it, which here in our own city has held thousands of listeners in rapt, exalted mood so often in the Music Hall! What if it were full of pearls! How many, as it now appears, of purest lustration, did he, careless of fame or publishers, leave hid away in corners, now first brought to light! Which is the real Schubert, the oyster or the pearl?

Perhaps, considering all that these men have done, and what they are to us and will be to mankind for ages, the all-sufficient simple excuse for the contradiction is: it proves them human, and so makes them doubly ours.

We have been speaking of composers, real composers, great ones. If the brain-work they did was so vast in quantity, so intense in energy, so sublime in quality, so far-reaching in influence, so historic, precious to the heart of ages, it surely proves the intellectuality of the tone-art itself, the element in which they wrought, and in which we too feel free, clear, high and happy, nearer heaven, while we listen to and love their inexhaustible creations. If it was great to do these things, is it not great to have and use and love them when done, as long as they will last?—and that would seem to be forever. What it was good to give, is it not good also to receive, and yield us to its charm, and woo its influence? And if this imply a certain passiveness of mind, abandonment of will on our part, are we less passive, are we more intellectual under the spell of poems or whatever kind of high discourse?

A Musical Tour in North Germany.

BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.—No. 3.

(From the London Choir.)

On leaving Berlin, where I had stayed at the "Hotel d'Angleterre," for the last four or five days, one of the largest and best hotels on the Continent, at which one can live, so much better are things managed abroad than in England, in the best possible way, good wine included, at the rate of ten shillings per diem, I proceeded by the evening mail at 8.30, and arrived in Leipzig at midnight. "Almost every living being in Leipzig," said a friend to me in Berlin, "is musical; they live on music, they can't live without it; art is their daily bread, is necessary to their very existence, and, moreover, the art with the Leipzigers is by no means a money-making business, but it is practised and studied, and dreamed of, for its own sake." Well, I thought, as I was driven along in a drosky from the station, which is nearly two miles from the city, so fraught with historic importance and so full of art and artists, will all my friend's assertions be realized? Most interesting was the drive through the streets of this picturesque old city, lighted up, but deserted, in the dead of night to the "Hotel de Bavière," where the host and his attendants were awaiting our arrival, and being known to my travelling companion, received us with much courtesy; I was soon made to feel as much at home as I well could at a hotel in a foreign country. In the morning, when I looked out of the window of my comfortable room to take a survey of the neighborhood, it seemed as if I could stretch my hands across to the houses opposite, so narrow are some of the streets, especially in the old parts of the city.

My first duty was to call on my friend Capellmeister Carl Reinecke, while it was still early, for I had been warned by my host that unless I went before nine o'clock I should run the risk of not finding him at home. I found him at half-past eight busy giving a pianoforte lesson, and after the usual greetings we made an appointment for eleven o'clock. In the meantime I walked about the city to take a cursory glance at the principal streets and public buildings. What attracted my attention most was the great square in which the celebrated fair is annually held, the visitors on this occasion being generally upwards of sixty thousand. In the most important streets I noticed with great astonishment that almost every third building was occupied by a bookseller or music publisher. But I am anxious to get back to my hotel to receive the Capellmeister, and long to be directed to some of the musical associations of Leipzig, and especially to those connected with its former illustrious residents, John Sebastian Bach and Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Like all other German musicians who had made appointments with me, Herr Reinecke kept his time exactly. After a little interesting conversation respecting his recent and successful visit to England, we proceeded to the famous "Conservatorium der Musik," the nursery of many musical geniuses, not only German and English (amongst the latter of whom one of the most eminent is Professor Sterndale Bennett), but of nearly every civilized country. The building stands in a large court yard, which is reached through an archway; it certainly has no pretensions to architectural beauty, and when I made an observation about this, as it appeared to me, defect to one of the Professors, he gave me as his opinion, that he considered the want of external beauty of no consequence; but what was of the greatest importance, the adaptation of its interior to the purposes required, and its "fitness for work, work, work, mein Herr," that was its greatest recommendation. The class rooms are all furnished in the simplest possible manner with desks, music-stands, tables, a few plain chairs, and the inevitable Breitkopf and Härtel grand pianos; no carpets, floors and walls alike being bare. The principal apartment is the concert hall, which with its peculiar gallery, from which the occupants seem, as it were, to pop their heads from out of the wall, will accommodate three hundred persons. The small orchestra possessed two grand pianofortes, and here the students during term exhibit their talents both in composition and performance to their friends and the public. During my expedition Herr Reinecke introduced me to Dr. Papperitz, the organist of the great organ in the Church of S. Nicholas, who was good enough to make an appointment with me for the following day, to hear and play that immense instrument. Among the students were two fine-looking negroes (from America I believe) and also the Rev. F. Scotson Clarke, Mus. Bac. Oxon, who, with others from England, were going through the courses of harmony and other instruction imparted by the different masters of the Academy.

Close [?] to the Conservatorium is the "St. Thomas Schule," part of which was once the house of Sebastian Bach, and in the gardens beneath it stands his statue. Deeply interested, I walk under the windows of the large, tall, quaint old building, and eventually found myself gazing at the statue of the most profound musician, the deepest thinker, the hardest worker of all the world's musical heroes. "Listen," I said to my friend, "listen, the choir are singing one of the dear old Cantor's motets," as I recognized at once that splendid eight-part unaccompanied work in G minor. With the greatest firmness, accuracy, and in strict time, by a choir of boys and men, was the piece sung, but interrupted occasionally, for I could hear everything distinctly, by the remarks of Dr. Richter, who caused the difficult passages to be sung again and again, until they were delivered perfectly. "Shade of John Sebastian," thought I, "how particular your countrymen are, how hard they work! no wonder your nation can appreciate and enjoy the highest and most subtle forms of musical composition." And now let me visit the well-known church of St. Thomas, close at hand, where Bach played the organ and produced most of those deathless compositions, notably the "Matthäus Passionsmusik," which have made his name immortal, and placed him on the highest pinnacle of excellence. Unfortunately time did not permit me to seek an entrance into thy Church, but the building itself is a huge mass of brick, stone, and plaster, with an enormously high-pitched roof studded with garret-looking windows, altogether not possessing that impressive exterior which somehow or other I had expected to see. Just after leaving the Church a troop of Prussian infantry overtook us, and though it was mid-day with a broiling July sun, they were marching at a remarkably quick pace. I was informed that this inuring their soldiers to every kind of fatigue is part of their military system—a system which our own authorities and those who made such numerous complaints about a certain march in our own country a few weeks ago would do well to look to. Proceeding with them for a short distance, when they halted at the old castle, we saw that three of their number instantaneously dropped down in a state of insensibility, but were immediately carried off to the castle by their fellows. The fine band of about sixty which headed them then struck up some lively and inspiring music.

After visiting the ramparts and the old walls, and driving through some of the most interesting suburbs of the city, I returned to my hotel to make preparations for hearing the opera. The opera-house is a noble building, standing in the immense square, opposite to the museum. I was told that I should hear "something anti classical, neither Gluck, Mozart, or Beethoven; certainly not Bach, but Offenbach!" The opera proved to be La Belle Hélène. The orchestra of forty selected players did more than justice to the sparkling and brilliant tunes of the lively modern French composer; indeed, the accompaniment to all the songs was throughout delicate and artistic; the principal singers were, however, scarcely equally excellent, the fair Hélène, especially, indulging in an extravagant amount of tremolando on nearly every note she produced. To me the most striking part of the affair was the engrossing attention paid to every detail of the performance by the crowded audience; they seemed to know every point of the opera, and would evidently have made the performers aware of their knowledge, had they been guilty of any faults of omission or commission. After the second act I repaired to my appointment at the house of Herr Reinecke, with whom, and another musical friend, I spent a most delightful evening.

Here, again, music was all in all; for four hours we were entirely absorbed in it: now one plays the piano, then another; now a duet, and then an improvisation; now a new original work, then an examination of some novelties by other composers; now a discussion on the state of music in England, then the government support of music in Germany: now organs and organists. And then (the creature comforts were not neglected) we adjourned to supper! but music, music is still the theme of our conversation. At the end of the meal the never-failing fragrant weed with its accompaniment of Rhine wine is produced, and again we talk of music and musicians. "And now," said my host, "before we part, let me show you the most valuable book in my library." He then brought out from amongst the tomes of great composers' works, with much care, an oblong folio book filled with autograph MSS. compositions by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Hummel, and many other famous musicians. This was one of the most interesting and valuable books I had ever seen. On its pages one could note how the thoughts of these great musical geniuses had been developed and written down. Beethoven was evidently as rapid in writing as he was full of ideas; here is a passage of some seven or eight bars which as soon as it is written gives place to some other production of his fertile imagination, the pens mark it down with lightning rapidity, and the great master rests satisfied with the improved version. Mozart's notes are smaller and neatly copied; but few corrections has the composer of Don Giovanni thought it necessary to make, whilst Hummel's writing is the perfection of neatness and accuracy.

"Yet one more book," said my hospitable friend, "and we will say 'gute Nacht.' Here is an album in which I have preserved, from crowned heads and musical celebrities, letters written to me during the last thirty years." In them were expressed the private thoughts and artistic views of Mendelssohn, Berlioz, David, Meyerbeer, Thalberg, Hiller, and indeed of all the musical worthies of the age. At last, with grateful expressions on my part for the charming hours I had spent in such glorious company, and mutual hopes that our next meeting would be in Yorkshire, we parted.

At ten o'clock on the following morning I repaired to the church of S. Nicholas, where I found, as usual, the organist, Dr. Papperitz, true to his appointment. The instrument in this church is one of the largest and most varied in its character of the notable modern organs of Germany, and has four manuals and ninety registers. The organist kindly showed me its varieties of tone in a short improvisation, and afterwards, at the particular request of Dr. Papperitz and the musical persons present, I had the pleasure of playing for nearly an hour, and making my hearers further acquainted with English music, of which their knowledge seemed to be rather limited. Notwithstanding the great size of this instrument, I found its arrangement so good that manipulation was comparatively easy. I much regretted that I had not been present on the previous Sunday, as there had been an organ concert, when Herr Rubke, a famous organist from Halle, played Bach's Tocatta in F (so well known to English organists), and the gathering was made doubly interesting by the presence of the distinguished Abbé Liszt, who in addition to his numerous other accomplishments possesses a power, as an organ writer and player, of no mean order. My next letter will contain a further account, and a detailed description of this famous instrument.

Dr. Calcott's MSS. in the British Museum.

As the popular composer of glees Dr. Calcott for the last eighty years has stood in his proper niche in the temple of English harmonists. To canvass his merits in this regard would be an absurdity. In all he did to perfect "the glee"—the school of composition peculiar to this country—he manifested such preternatural fecundity, such vigor and originality, and such general felicity of style, as to astonish his contemporaries and overwhelm all rivals. Unsuccessful in his first attempt for the prize of 1784, he gained all three prizes the next year, and the year after sent in no less than a hundred—a dose which had the effect of giving rise to the rule that for the future every candidate should limit his industry to three specimens of each description of composition. The year following Calcott complied with the new rule, and carried off all the four prizes—a circumstance then unparalleled in the history of the Catch Club, and never since equalled.

Dr. Calcott, as is well known, was a prodigious worker. He dedicated his life to the end of creating a Grammar of Music, a Theory, a Biographical Dictionary of Professors and Composers, and a General Encyclopedia of Musical Science and Practice. He occupied ten years in perfecting his plans for these four works, and had spent another decade in heaping up and abstracting materials, when his nervous organization gave way, and he became incapable of all professional exertion. He had worked unremittingly for upwards of twenty years amid the literature of knowledge, through the pages of the unimpassioned and the superannuated, the essays of teachers and the methods of teaching, and what he did during these twenty years his sixty volumes of manuscript writing now in the British Museum reveal to the scholar and the musical profession. When looking over this large mass of unbroken intellectual activity no one can marvel that the reason fled; that the sunshine attending the gaining of power in knowledge should have passed into a permanent wintry gloom; and that a great star should have been withdrawn to dwell apart mid darkness and cloud. Had he exercised more of his prerogative in the creation of music, relieved the memory and the understanding in working the higher faculties of the imagination, it is more than probable he might have avoided the calamity that led to his being sequestered from his beloved avocations, and have escaped drinking of that bitter cup which it would seem the sons of genius not infrequently are fated to drain to its very dregs.

Calcott was born in Kensington, schooled there, studied there, lived and died there. When barely twelve years of age he was taken from school, and it was settled he was to be an apothecary and surgeon. The sight of the first operation so affected him that it was necessary to remove him from all associations of the kind, and he at once commenced the study of music as a learned and scientific profession. He became acquainted with Mr. Overend, of Isleworth, who, like Mr. Kent, of Winchester, and Dr. Boyce, had been smitten with the theory of Dr. Pepusch, the great theoretical musician of Berlin. Pepusch had left Berlin, resided in London, married a popular Italian singer with a great fortune, and spent a long life in the exercise of the literature of knowledge, gathering together a wondrous collection of books on the art and science of music, teaching the best geniuses of his time, and creating a fashion for the study of the subtleties of musical art as it was understood and practised by the old fathers in composition. He professed to throw sunlight upon the old tones, the Church contrapuntal scales; and such was his zeal that he stirred up all the warm blood in the profession in favor of his beloved study. Kelway, Keeble, Dr. Holder, and Benjamin Stillingfleet, owe their predilections and bias to the learning of Pepusch; and Kent, Overend, Boyce, and Worgan spent their lives in interblending the results of their incessant application to the investigations of the relations of sound with the more genial and certainly more durable efforts of realizing results. These men let the public know in many clever and pleasing compositions the advantages arising from such studies, and the assistance they gave to talents however popular and versatile. Handel created a school in England, Dr. Pepusch made an academy; and to this day every English scholar in music, when tracing his career, must admit his great obligations to the little Doctor that married the ugly songstress with the long purse. Kent of Winchester died leaving his folios of calculations on the intervals of the vexed scales; Overend spent his life in figures of the like nature; Boyce took up Overend, and poor Dr. Calcott took up Boyce. The manuscripts of Kent and Overend, so highly prized by Calcott, have since been sold by public auction for a few shillings; and the extended quartos of Boyce were not long since purchased under half-a-sovereign. All knowledge like this is as the fashion of this world that passeth away, but self-prompted genius rediscovers for itself, and the elementary truths or principles of the forbidden science crop up again, and have their outcome in almost every generation. Even the man most afflicted with the demon of curiosity shuts his eyes at the last new craze, but the yearnings of the new student are not to be daunted or thwarted by either incredulity or neglect, and thus he redraws diagrams, recreates theories, and at length makes a system which he can himself work, and in which he finds much satisfaction. There are no less than thirty-nine little octavo volumes in the handwriting of Dr. Calcott filled with clever and compact abstracts of most of the great writers on theory, varied by marks of the great range of his reading and his determination to gain mastery over every branch of the sciences. Greek, Latin, Syriac, Hebrew, French, Italian, Spanish, geometry, algebra, trigonometry, high forms in arithmetic,—whatever seemed to him necessary to know in the pursuit of his study he would know; and how it was all done whilst pursuing the ordinary avocations of a music-master seems a perfect marvel. The number of works he translated is most extraordinary, and this at a time when help in the shape of critical lexicons and well arranged scientific dictionaries was not ordinarily within reach, if indeed to be obtained at all. Nor should be forgotten the labor and great expense of accumulating his comprehensive and exhausting library: the time it must have taken, the sums of money required, the necessary learning to guide in its selection. The works of the older theorists, such as Gaffurius, Zarlino, Doni, Prinz, Mattheson, Rameau, Tartini, Marpurg, and Martini, it is plain he had at his fingers' ends, and no work by any one of his own countrymen escaped his observation and analysis. There is a careful and shrewd analysis of the five volumes of Hawkins's History of Music, and an equally well done one of Burney. He not only condenses Gaffurius, but gives a lively and brilliant account of his life. So also with Foliannus, the earliest author proving the consonance of the third and sixth, and also Eroschius, the able reviver of the system of Pythagoras, a system which to this day has its advocates with some of the most modern French theorists. Then there is the notice on that strange work by Claude Sebastianus, "Bellum Musicale," a summary of the contention between the now called homophones of the second of the major key and the fourth of its relative minor. Amid all this wealth of learning stands conspicuous Dr. Callcott's great honesty: it is at once apparent whether he knows a rare book by personal inspection or is merely quoting from record or hearsay. Over the "Syntagma Musicum" of Michael Praetorius he laments he has never been able to gain a sight of it, nor even of the "Pleiades Musicæ" of Baryphorius, who it is said in this no less rare work gives an account of the "Syntagma." It is hardly necessary to mention that, although copies of other works by Praetorius have occasionally turned up since Dr. Callcott's time, no copy of the "Syntagma" has ever been seen. Then there are his essays on the Use and Abuse of Musical Theory, the Invention of Counterpoint, Musical Literature, Progress of Vocal Harmony, Improvements in the Organ, and his Lectures written when he succeeded Dr. Crotch as lecturer at the public Institutions in the metropolis. And these Essays and Lectures are not the things of the present day; a few platitudes stringing together some popular glees, anthems, and songs, but massive, solid, and masterly summaries, conveying an extraordinary gathering together of learning, written plainly, clearly, unostentatiously, and with the kindest and most genial spirit—bestowing commendation wherever deserved, and pointing out all that is valuable for subsequent thought and consideration.

Callcott was one of the leaders—one of the torch-bearers of musical science in this country, and has made his name famous among the deservedly great musicians of all countries. We look over these mementos of his untiring and indomitable industry with a mixture of curiosity and veneration: and who is there who does not mourn over these pledges for a great national result? There is no want of arrangement, yet to ordinary readers they present a chaos indicative of the mind that was severed from them—threads of thought broken—the web left imperfect forever.—Orchestra.

Nebuchadnezzar's Band.

THE MUSIC THEY PLAYED.

What sort of music was played by Nebuchadnezzar's band?

First, if we find an instrument of music which will only give forth a certain series of notes, we are tolerably safe in assuming that it did only play such a tune as those notes would make. And, to go a step further, if we find an instrument on which those notes could only be played in such an order, we have the identical tune. And if we find an ancient Pandean pipe or syrinx, we can tell what kind of air might have been played on it; and sometimes, when the pipes are so arranged, the very air itself.

Secondly, if we recognize among the music of our own day a class of compositions which require the use of certain notes and intervals only, and if, moreover, we discover that in the Assyrian instruments only these notes and intervals occur, we are justified in asserting that we can approximate to the character of the music which was played by them.

Again, if we see representations in Assyrian sculpture of a number of musicians playing together, and have already identified their instruments, and the power of each, we can tell pretty nearly the amount of noise, and the kind of noise, which was made by them.

Lastly, when we see in some sculptures an army or a religious procession, or a dance, keeping time to the music, we can approximate to the pace at which these musicians played.

So when we have the instruments we can tell the range of each of them by actual experiment; we know the series of notes and the intervals found on each; we are acquainted with a style of music in our own day which might be played on similar instruments; we have the bas-reliefs and pictures necessary for determining which set of musicians formed a band; and we are able to distinguish between the kind of composition in use at a march, a dance, or a religious ceremony.

The octave is universal in Europe in modern times, but it seems that among the Greeks, and among the Eastern nations from whom they adopted their music, a different division was obtained. On the Assyrian musical instruments, so far as we are acquainted with them, it would have been impossible to sound every note of an octave. Certain notes were habitually omitted—they were the fourth note of our octave and the seventh. David's ten-stringed harp or lute contained two octaves of this kind, and some of the Assyrian harps had twenty-six strings—that is, five pentatonic octaves, and one note or "key-note" over. But an objector will say, "How ugly such music must be!" Quite the contrary—it is the sweetest of all. "The Last Rose of Summer" is a pentatonic air; so is "The Lass o' Gowrie," and the proof of these being pentatonic lies in the fact that, if you play over either of these melodies on the black notes only of the piano, passing over any white ones that may seem to be required, you will find the original air come out with the utmost distinctness. But, you say again, these are Scotch and Irish tunes. True, and all the old Scotch and Irish musical instruments are made to sound only the pentatonic scale, and you will find by experiment that many other Irish and Scotch airs beside those named above may be reduced to the same scale.

And, again, many travellers have remarked on the peculiar sweetness and plaintiveness of most of the melodies still played in the East on "kiasars," and "sautirs," and pipes," almost exactly similar to those figured in the Assyrian sculptures—nay, some voyagers in remote places in Asia have been struck by the familiar sound of some old melody, played almost exactly as they had heard it, in years gone by, upon bagpipes or harps in Scotland or Ireland. M. Engel, in his book on ancient music, has enumerated many cases of this kind, and has, besides, given examples of the tunes; and this goes far to prove that we are right in assuming that, where this peculiar division of the octave was in use, the melodies for which it was used were more or less alike.

One thing more. Were these melodies in a major or minor key? It is not very easy to determine. The oldest musical instrument discovered at Babylon is a pipe made of baked clay. It sounds the intervals of the common chord, either major or minor, according to which notes are used. A hole at one side completes a major chord; a hole answering to it, at the other, gives the minor. This curious "picco" of two thousand years ago is in the Asiatic Society's Museum; but it would be assuming too much to argue from it, or from any number of similar specimens, that the Babylonians were acquainted with what we call major and minor keys. Such divisions, we must recollect, are purely arbitrary, and, from a number of other circumstances, we shall be safer in concluding—if, indeed we come to any conclusion—that no fixed rule of the kind was adopted. And if the objector asks for an example of such an extraordinary kind, we can refer him to many of the modern Oriental melodies which have been recently brought to this country, or to the Irish and Scotch tunebooks, which contain several examples. For instance, in "Moore's Melodies," the song "Silent, O Moyle," is set to an old tune which begins in a minor and ends in a major, nor is the transition unpleasant. Strange to say, all the "arrangers" of Moore have overlooked this fact, and have added a line of accompaniment to bring it back to the original key.—Cassell's Magazine.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. These began on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 1, with the following programme:

Overture "Oberon".....Weber.
Symphony No. 1, in C, Op. 21.....Beethoven.
Air, "I mourn as a dove" (St. Peter).....Benedict.

Air, "Oh, if there be on this earthly sphere" (Paradise and the Peri).....J. F. Barnett.
Concerto, piano-forte, in G, Op. 58.....Beethoven.
Duet, "Mira la blanca luna".....Rosini.
Ouverture di Ballo.....Arthur S. Sullivan.
Piano-forte Solos.....Schubert and S. Heller.
New Song, "Puck's the Fair".....Balle.
March from Suite No. 1.....Lachner.

We give a portion of the comment of the Times. The remarks upon "Cadenzas" in Concertos are worthy of attention.

When Mr. Manns took his place before the conductor's desk he was received with a burst of applause, in which every one of the audience seemed more or less heartily to join. No such compliment was ever more worthily bestowed—and this for reasons with which our amateur readers must be tolerably conversant. That the orchestra was the same numerous and well-trained body of exponents which for many seasons, under the superintendence of their zealous—nay, enthusiastic—director, has helped to win an almost exceptional musical reputation for the Crystal Palace, the performance of Weber's overture to Oberon sufficed convincingly to show. Nothing more careful as to detail, nothing more spirited, could have been desired. Still more interesting, however, than this fiery and romantic prelude was the piece immediately following.

It is generally known that, in consequence of 1870 being the centenary of the birth of Beethoven (who came into the world December 17, 1770—four lustres and one year before the death of Mozart), it is intended at the concerts preceding Christmas to accord unusual prominence to the orchestral compositions of that master, and especially to give his nine symphonies without exception. The admirable execution of the first of these undying masterpieces, the vigorous, bright, and everywhere melodious Symphony in C—the symphony in which, as if where at a bound, the Beethoven of 30 summers (or, as he himself, with sad veracity, might have styled them, winters) proved himself equal to Haydn and Mozart at their best—was an alluring foretaste of what we have to expect. And it may be stated with confidence, judging from experience, that what we can reasonably look forward to is a performance of each of the nine symphonies as good as any performances that have been heard elsewhere, at home or abroad—even at the Paris Conservatoire, where, but for antagonistic causes, lamented by all the civilized world, the universally renowned orchestral concerts, which the musical Germans themselves have never been able to surpass, rarely to emulate, would be just now about to commence. (Fancy the thunder of German cannons silencing the symphonies of Beethoven—most German of all Germans!)

Thus much may be relied upon with confidence; and a better guarantee of what is to follow than the execution of "No. 1"—an execution to criticize which would, as it seems to us, be hypocritical—could not possibly have been afforded. Movement after movement—from the grave adagio ushering in the allegro con brio, first-born of the giants, to the humorous and exhilarating finale—was precisely what it should be. Every member of the orchestra apparently went through his task con amore—that is, if unswerving precision, the delicate observation of light and shade, and a sustained unanimity of attack which up to the final reiterated chords might have induced the belief that a single instrument with many various stops and voice had been played upon all the time, by some expert and vigorous executant, may count for anything. To say more than that each movement of the symphony was listened to with eager attention, and that at the conclusion the applause was loud and general, would be superfluous. Let us hope (and we have little doubt of it (that when the turn of the "No. 9"—Colossus of Colossi—comes round, we may be able conscientiously to exclaim, "The end is worthy the beginning." Among the ingenious and instructive "programmatic" remarks signed with the familiar and, to amateurs, always welcome initial "G." (the signature of a genuine enthusiast, if there ever was one), there is one passage to which we must with deference take exception. "Except however," writes "G." "for the fact that it is Beethoven's first, the starting point in his mighty orchestral career, this symphony is hardly of any especial interest." Happily, a short way down, in his succinct but able analysis, "G." shows that he himself takes an "especial interest" in every part of the symphony. So did a greater than "G." Mendelssohn, on being asked which of the seven great symphonies of Beethoven he liked best, answered abruptly, "Seven—why, there are nine;" and, on further discussion, said that he liked to hear one or another according to the frame of mind he might happen to be in. At times—and that the least frequently because of the enormous stretch of attention it demanded—it would be the "No. 9," at other times the "No. 7," at others the

"C minor"—and so on; but on no account would Mendelssohn hear of Nos. "1" and "2" being placed apart from the other seven.

If it is intended, which every one will hope may be the case, to include the five pianoforte concertos (as well as the violin concerto) in the ante-Christmas programmes, it was wrong, we think, to begin with the fourth. That to hear so noble and beautiful a composition, played, too, with such brilliancy and refinement as were exhibited by Mr. Charles Hallé on the occasion under notice, must be agreeable under any circumstances, can hardly be denied. Nevertheless, in order to make the scheme consistent, it would have been wiser to commence with the earliest concerto (C major, Op. 15), thence proceeding chronologically, through the series, which culminates with the not inaptly styled "Emperor" (E flat, No. 5)—the grandest, perhaps, of all concertos, no matter for what instrument, or from what pen. By the way, Mr. Hallé, who was loudly applauded and called back to the orchestra at the termination of his performance, introduced in the first and last movements, the cadenzas written by Beethoven himself, who in his fifth and last concerto expressly stipulates that there shall be "no cadenzas." To our notion a cadenza—generally no more nor less than something interpolated in the work of a master which that master has not himself composed—is out of place and out of taste, unless improvised, as Mendelssohn was wont to do. Cadenzas are simply opportunities for egotistical display on the part of the solo executant, and, in nine cases out of ten, blemishes on the otherwise transparent surface. That Beethoven held them in no great affection may be gathered from the cadenzas ostensibly meant to be introduced whenever his fourth concerto is played, but which are virtually so extravagant that one can scarcely refrain from the belief that in writing them the illustrious musician had chiefly in mind to turn the system of interpolation into ridicule. Regarded as abstract music, these cadenzas are out of sorts with the Orphean inspiration with which certain zealous musicians who think Beethoven was incapable of a joke connect them as a matter of course. Improvisations, such as Mendelssohn, Hummel, and occasionally Moscheles, have been heard to make, by not a few amateurs now living, and such as Mozart, Beethoven, Woelfl, Steibelt, Clementi, and Dussek, according to credible authority, were accustomed to make, must always be entertained in a degree commensurate with their merit; but written improvisations are pure anomalies. Nevertheless, we find many such perpetrations—like the ornaments supplied so prodigally for the pure and noble pianoforte concertos of Mozart by men of no less repute than Hummel and John Cramer—actually printed and published with the works themselves, as though they formed integral parts of them.

To the fact that Mr. Hallé played Beethoven's cadenzas well, no one who knows anything about pianoforte playing could be insensible; but that, on the other hand, these cadenzas, if only for the composer's sake, were better omitted, must equally have been apparent to those who know anything about music. When Beethoven wrote over one cadenza, "Cadenza—ma senza cadere"—a bad play upon Italian words, he indirectly made known the small esteem he entertained for gratuitous exhibitions of "virtuosity;" and this was more emphatically shown by his sudden admonition to ambitious pianists, just at the long coveted "point d'orgue"—"no cadenza"—in the first movement of his E flat concerto. Mendelssohn left no opening for cadenzas in either of his pianoforte concertos; while, in his concerto for violin, finding that one might be in place and effective, he cunningly inserted a cadenza of his own, which reminds us of the terminal shake for the flute, in "Oh rest in the Lord" (Elijah) which saved the singer much pains and the composer, perhaps, still more annoyance.

VIARDOT GARCIA.—The Athenæum tells us:

One of the queens of song, an artiste, who in almost all European languages has sung on the lyric stages of Italy, Spain, England, France, Germany, Russia, &c., Pauline Viardot Garcia, is about to visit London, to resume her professional career. Her fortune has been sacrificed by the war in France, of which country her husband is a native. Whilst M. Viardot is at Tours, having joined his former political and literary colleagues in office, Mme. Viardot has been compelled to quit her residence in Baden-Baden to begin a fresh career. This is a sad reverse for the gifted sister of Malibran. Viardot's debut as Desdemona in Paris and London in 1839, when she was only eighteen, can be well remembered by Opera frequenters. Viardot in Berlin stood her ground at the height of Jenny Lind's popularity. She doubled on one occasion in an emergency, the parts of Lakella and Alice in Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable,"—an unprecedented (?) feat. Meyerbeer's opinion that she was the best Valentina he ever heard, is on record. Viardot's "creation" of the character of Fides in the "Prophète" is familiar to the audiences of Paris and London. Her last great part was Gluck's Orfeo. She has given to the world singers of note who were her pupils, and it is as a teacher and as a composer (for she has written an opera in two acts, "The Lost Magician," which has been performed in several theatres in Germany,) that Mme. Viardot will seek to secure a position in London; and the royalty, rank and fashion which recognized her varied talents when she was a prima donna, will doubtless not fail her in the hour of need, when she presents herself as a Professor,—one of the members of the grand school of singing of the Garcias.

DEATH OF BALFE.—Michael William Balfe, the composer, died yesterday in London at the age of sixty-two. Balfe has not been without honor in this day and generation. Few men who have written so feebly have attained such popularity. His operas have been received with favor in England and in this country for the last thirty years. They are pleasant and melodious, but neither strong nor original. Among those of them that are best known are "The Bohemian Girl," "The Enchantress," and "The Puritan's Daughter." Balfe was the imitator of Auber, but followed him at an immense distance. He was born at Dublin, in 1808, and took lessons of Charles E. Horn, who afterwards was so well known in this city. His talent for music was early displayed, and he began his career as a vocalist, even singing so difficult a part as that of Rossini's Figaro (under the name of Balfi) with Malibran and Sontag at the Theatre Italien at Paris. Subsequently he turned his attention to composition. His daughter Victoria Balfe was eminent as a vocalist. She married Sir John Crampton, who was once the English Minister at Washington. From him she was divorced, and then married the Duke de Frias, a Spanish nobleman.

Balfe lived mostly in England, where at one time he was manager at Drury Lane Opera House. Of late he has not composed any work of merit.—Sun, (New York).

WAR SONGS.—The Orchestra of Oct. 11, says:

Concert-goers have been very bellicose this week. On Wednesday two outbursts of war-songs took place—one at St. James's Hall, the other at the Crystal Palace. That at St. James's Hall, being for the benefit of the German Association for the Relief of the Sick and the Wounded, being in other words a commentary upon the wickedness and cruelty of war, was made up principally of incentives to slaughter; and the most popular songs were those which, like Hiller's "To Arms," Randegger's "Forwards," and the everlasting "Watch on the Rhine," encouraged that very evil which it was the raison d'être of the concert to diminish. So consistent is human nature. We have to chronicle, however, a very successful gathering: the hall was crammed; the occasion was patronized by a number of German authorities, from Count Bernstorff downwards; among the artists the Signori became Herren, Mr. Randegger hardened his two g's into gutturals, and Mr. Benedict was down as Herr Julius on the programme. The Teutonic element being complete on the platform, nothing remained for the audience but to carry out the spirit of applauding all the blood-thirsty recommendations to the encores. And this they did. Frau Rudersdorff has written a poem "Vorwärts," which, with Randegger's music, went with great success, a choral refrain lending it additional effect. Mr. Benedict's "Dead Soldier" was another feature of the concert, and created a good impression alike by the music and the good singing of Miss Alice Fairman. So also the Gesangverein's rendering of Ferdinand Hiller's song "Zur Wehre," and Carl Wilhelm's much heeded Rhine hymn. A great success was achieved by Herr Nordblom, the new tenor, who will make his appearance at the Crystal Palace concert to-morrow, and whose well trained voice and careful art promise for him a good position among the scanty band of tenors. Mme. Lind Goldschmidt should have appeared at this concert, but was prevented by illness; and Mlle. Drasil was similarly incapacitated.

Among the instrumental pieces which relieved the songs, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. Benedict, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt offered contributions; and Herr Richard Hammer, a pianist from Paris, gave evidence of brilliant powers as an executant. A Hungarian zither quartet pleased; and in all its features the concert for the German Association realized the expectations formed concerning it.

At the Crystal Palace Mr. G. W. Martin and a choir of 4000 voices made jubilee with the war-songs of different nations. "Rule Britannia," "See the Conquering Hero," "Come if you dare," "The Watch on the Rhine," and the "Marseillaise" found various expressions, and severally delighted the audience, especially the last, which was encored and would even have been demanded thrice in the enthusiasm of the audience, but the singers declined the compliment. Mr. Vernon Rigby sang "Sound an Alarm," and was encored. A Hymn of Peace, written for the occasion by Mr. G. W. Martin, much pleased the listeners, as did a French war song, which was also encored. "The German Fatherland," "Partant pour la Syrie," and our National Anthem, completed the programme. The programme is to be repeated next Wednesday, so well did its ingredients please the sympathetic audience.

LEIPZIG. A grand concert was given a few days ago, by the members of Riedel's Association, in St. Thomas's, for the benefit of German soldiers and their families. It commenced with J. S. Bach's choral piece for the organ, "Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott," well played by Herr Louis Papier. Then came two Hussite songs for chorus, which, as well as the other pieces of a similar kind, two sacred songs by Peter Cornelius, two choruses from Mendelssohn's Elijah and St. Paul, were sung with spirit and correctness by the members of the Association. Herr and Mme. Joachim executed together the solo for alto and obligato violin accompaniment, "Erbarme dich meiner, o Gott," by J. S. Bach. Mme. Joachim sang also the air, "Ich weiss dass mein Erlöser lebt," from Handel's Messiah, while Herr Joachim performed, as only he can perform, two Andantes from Bach's Violin Sonatas, a similar composition by Tartini, and Schumann's "Abendlied." Mlle. Mahlknecht sang the soprano solo from Raff's "Die Profundis."—First Gewandhaus Concert on the 6th inst.: Oxford Symphony, Haydn; air from Judas Maccabeus, Handel (Mme. Peschka-Leutner); Concerto in A major for Pianoforte, Mozart (Herr Reinecke); Recitative and Aria, Mozart (Mme. Peschka-Leutner); and the Seventh Symphony, A major, Beethoven.—The Directors of the above concerts contemplated, a short time since, raising the subscription, in consequence of the very high prices demanded by "stars," especially by all vocal stars. With reference to this circumstance, a correspondent wrote a very strong letter to the Leipziger Tageblatt. Among other things he said:—

"We feel convinced that the real friends of music will applaud the Directors, if the latter will simply refuse to listen to exorbitant demands, even at the risk of our not hearing here in Leipzig some celebrated songstress, while on the other hand, by proper remuneration, they seek to retain the admirable members of the band, and to gain fresh ones, for the great attraction of the concerts is the celebrated orchestra; it is solely their performances, not strange virtuosi, which have obtained for the concerts their world-wide renown."

In consequence partly of this article, perhaps, the Directors have made no alteration in the subscription. Herr August Langert has just completed a new opera, entitled Dornröschen, which has been accepted at the Stadttheater, and will be produced this season. The libretto is by Dr. Alexander Levy of Treves. The rehearsals of Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger have been resumed. The scenery is ready, and in all probability, the opera will be produced towards the latter end of December.

VIENNA. Business is very good just now at the Imperial Operahouse. This may partly be attributed to the great number of strangers here at present. Mlle. Bertha Ehn has returned, after a long absence in Italy, and re-appeared in Faust, Mignon, and other operas. Miss Minnie Hauck, too, is singing away again as blithe as a lark; she is a great favorite in parts like Zerlina, but her more serious efforts are not so popular.

At that establishment the principle has been laid down, once for all, that the various artists representing the same line of business shall, as it is termed, "alternate" in the different parts, or, to speak more idiomatic English, that each artist shall play every part in his turn. Robert le Diable was announced. Herr Rokitsansky was Bertram. Herr Rokitsansky was, moreover, hoarse, and very hoarse, to boot. But the principle of "alternation" required that Herr Rokitsansky should, on that particular evening, sing the part, though he had not a note in his voice, and he consequently did sing it—without a note in his voice—while not fewer than four other basses—Herrn Schmidt, Draxler, Hablawetz, and Meyerhofer, all belonging to the theatre, in the rudest health, and the best possible vocal feather, if such an expression be permissible, were in the front of the house, seeing their unfortunate colleague sing.

Sig. Ceresa is still being assiduously "coached up" in German for his debut at the Imperial Operahouse. He was formerly first tenor at the Italian Opera. Having amassed a large fortune, he retired. He lost it all, however, by unfortunate speculations, and consequently determined on returning to the stage. He is said to possess a voice such as has not been heard since the time of Fraschini. He will first appear as Eleazar in La Juive.—The "Gesellschafts-concerto" recommence, on the 20th Nov., with Handel's Israel in Egypt.

ESSLINGEN. The Oratorio Association lately gave a concert for the benefit of the soldiers wounded in the war. The programme was made up of compositions by J. S. Bach, Handel, Stradella, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Professor Fink. A very deep impression was produced by the fact that, as the soprano air, "Der du die Menschen sterben lässest" ("Thou who lettest men die"), originally composed by Mendelssohn for St. Paul, was being sung, the bell of the neighboring Roman Catholic church began tolling for a soldier brought from Strasburg who had died of his wounds. Herr Friedrich Fink, master in the Conservatory of Music, Stuttgart, performed, with marked ability, an organ prelude, in E flat major, by J. S. Bach.

BRUSSELS. Herr von Flotow's new opera, L' Ombre, has been successfully produced at the Theatre de la Monnaie. M. Duprez's opera, Jeanne d'Arc, is to be brought out shortly. The composer has already arrived for the purpose of superintending the rehearsals.

Review of Concerts.

THEO. THOMAS'S CONCERTS. Our review so far has covered only the first two of the series and the two Beethoven programmes. Besides the three Beethoven Symphonies, &c., given in these four concerts, there figured in two of the programmes two other smaller selections from Beethoven, viz.: another portion of the Septet (Adagio and Minuet) and the Andante and Variations from the Quartet, Op. 18, both played by all the strings. In such things the nicety and perfection of the Thomas orchestra particularly shows itself. There were no other whole Symphonies in any of the programmes, though there were plenty of the Lisztian "Symphonic Poems," entirely a different kind of animal, not classed as yet in natural history. But the remaining concerts afforded quite a variety from other classical masters besides Beethoven. There was a Concerto by Bach, for three violins, three violas, 3 cellos and contra-bass, in which Mr. Thomas led in person, being an admirable violinist; and the three movements of the wholesome, hearty music went to a charm. There was some interesting Ballet music from Gluck's "Paris et Hélène"; a portion (Andantino and March) from Spohr's "Consecration of Tones;" the Andante and Scherzo from Schubert's great Symphony in C; also an entr'acte from his Drama: "Rosamunde," and a Reitermarsch. Mendelssohn was represented only by the Overture to "Ruy Blas;" Schumann (after the first two concerts, in which we had the piano Concerto and the "Geneveva" Overture) only by the "Abendlied" and the little pianissimo effect of the "Träumerei;" Mozart by the piano Concerto in D minor and the Overture to the "Magic Flute;" Weber, by the Overtures to "Euryanthe" and "Freyschütz" and the Concert-stück; Haydn, only by the little Serenade taken from a Quartet. That all these things were presented in a very delicate, artistic manner, there is no need of saying.

Of less familiar works in classical form and temper, not running into the modern extravagance, the Overture to 'Medea' by Bargiel was particularly interesting, being much in the same sombre, tragic tone with that of Cherubini. The Overture to "Semiramis," by Catel (we suppose the old professor in the Paris Conservatoire), was as different as possible from Rossini's with the same name, having none of its luxurious suggestion of Oriental gold and purple; it is a clear, honest composition, rather in the Cherubini vein, only not carried out to all it leads you to expect. The "Concert (or Fest) Overture," by Rietz, too, made a good impression.

The popular, familiar selections were such Overtures as "Tell" and "Siege of Corinth" by Rossini (both of them thoroughly good as well as popular, so that there is a peculiar pleasure now and then in hearing such a thing perfectly performed, knowing, as you do, that everybody enjoys it with you), "Zampa," by Herold; "Merry Wives," Nicolai; "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Stradella," Flotow; and a plentiful supply of the daintiest and most enlivening Waltzes, Polkas and Mazourkas by Strauss, of which we doubt if Strauss himself, in his own Vienna, ever played them better.

A very important feature in these concerts was, of course, the Concerto-playing by that never satiating (but very satisfying) pianist, Miss ANNA MEHLIG. Besides the four which we have already mentioned (those in G and in E flat by Beethoven, the one by Schumann, and the strangest of the strange by Liszt, in A), she also played the one by Henselt in F minor, which, although graceful, still strikes us as commonplace and sentimental, rather in the Thalberg vein without his perfect symmetry, a sort of difficult and florid etude, rather than a classical creation. But it was played with such limpid evenness and smoothness, every note so distinct and every phrase so finished, that it charmed the sense, if it did not go any deeper. A rarer treat it was to hear a Mozart Concerto, that in D minor, one of the best, so beautifully rendered alike by piano and by orchestra. Here is music as sincere as it is elegant, full of genial fancy,—music for music's sake, and not so much for the display of all that modern instruments and hands can execute. The Concerto by Ferdinand Hiller, in F-sharp minor, has many traits of interest and freshness, much of it original and striking, far superior to Henselt's in orchestral treatment; yet it seems to fall just short of being one of the positive felicities of genius. The Concert-stück of Weber, in Miss Mehlig's brilliant rendering, always makes a sensation with the mass of a miscellaneous audience; but it does grow a little hacknied. The earlier Concerto by Liszt (No. 1, in E flat), which we have heard here before, both by Miss Mehlig and Miss Topp, does not win its way any nearer to our heart. Its pretty effects and quaint surprises cannot purchase forgiveness for its repulsive leading motive and its obvious Wagnerisms. Miss Mehlig also gave great pleasure by now and then a favorite thing from Chopin.

The solos upon various instruments were such as one might expect from members of so excellent an orchestra, all artists in their way. Mr. HART-DEGEN showed remarkable execution on the violoncello in a difficult Concerto by Goltermann. Mr. ELLER's oboe sang the Schubert Ave Maria with singular purity and sweetness of tone and with fine expression. There were also rare displays of virtuosity on the flute, the horn, and the trombone.

The specimens of Wagner and of Liszt offered abundant opportunity for getting some idea of what this modern music actually is. Curiosity at all events was gratified. The works were presented by an orchestra completely equipped and competent for such tasks; the fault must be in the music if it awakened small desire for more acquaintance. And this we believe to have been the fact with the vast majority of the audiences, particularly those who love and hear music musically. Wagner's music, of course, affords comparatively little of orchestral music as such; not a believer in pure music himself, taking his stand entirely on the ground of Opera, in his peculiar sense, it is in his operas alone that he is fairly to be judged. When we have the Overture to Tannhäuser and the Vorspiel to Lohengrin, which are instrumental works that stand by themselves (although the latter seems to need interpretation), we have about all that has ever won a foothold in the concert room. Besides these, Mr. Thomas gave us the noisy and outrageous overture to his early opera: "The Flying Dutchman," and the more pretentious work which Wagner is pleased to call "A Faust Overture." This has some grand and gloomy passages, and gives expression, after a too coarse and literal fashion, to the inward strife and discontent of life, the wrestling of the soul with fate, &c. But it is all gloom, unrelieved by any really genial and triumphant trait. Not so has Goethe himself treated Faust; in the poem, Art, genius, poetry, the spirit, the immortal element rises superior to the gloomy subject. So would it have been had Shakespeare treated it. So, with still greater reason, should it be when music undertakes it. Beethoven would have been the man for it; his music never shirks the dark and painful problems; plenty of the discontent, the yearning, the despair of life, finds great expression there; but evermore, by power of faith and love and sovereign geniality, he works out joy and triumph in the end, the sun shines out gloriously through the parting clouds, so that after all, in all his music, joy, joy is the last word, the keynote into which it all continually resolves, as clearly as in the Joy Chorus of the Ninth Symphony. We cannot but regard that as false Art, which seeks new field for originality in giving unredeemed and cheerless, fruitless utterance to those gloomy moods, which, however they may enter into the experience of all, even the noblest, richest, deepest souls, and however essential perhaps to the spiritual economy of life in the long run, have really no right to public expression, but belong, by every modest instinct of propriety, to strictest privacy, at least until the discord is resolved.

Still less of musical consistency, of intrinsically musical raison d'être, of any whole harmonious impression left behind, and still more of extravagance, of unnatural straining after strange and dazzling effects in what often seems too conscious poverty of pregnant, vitally imaginative ideas, such as not only admit of but necessitate consistent musical development, do we find in the "Symphonic Poems," &c., of the sensational Abbate Liszt. We certainly have done our best to like this music, improving every invitation which Mr. Thomas has so liberally given. But so far our efforts do not prosper much; and we believe the general voice is with us, with far more unanimity than usual in the comparison of fresh impressions. This, too, is music which does not stand alone. It pre-supposes a poem to be read, an argument, a programme. But the attempt to bring the picture and the key together is somehow strangely unrewarding; far easier to fall back either upon poem or upon Symphony; the former (say by Goethe or by Schiller) surely does not need the latter; and the latter, if it cannot help itself, gets small help from the former. The most reasonable piece among them is the most familiar one, "Les Preludes," (which Mr. Thomas gave in an extra Matinée, reproducing his first Boston programme). This is always interesting in its details, its novel, often charming traits of instrumentation; but what ideal treasure does it leave behind to haunt the soul, or what new germ of higher life has it implanted? The next most endurable is the "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," which, while it has its overstrained and ugly passages, has also something quite dramatic, which for the time being takes possession of the hearer. At all events it has some progress, it moves on to an end. Not so we found it with "Die Ideale," intended to illustrate Schiller's poem. This work, very long, confused and tedious, seemed frequently to halt; ideas were started; but they "would not march;" what with all the "storm and stress," all the curious transitions and surprises, all the stupendous strainings, there were long places where a sort of helpless palsy seemed to come over it all, while answering calls from instrument to instrument, with dreary pauses, served but to reveal the echoing walls of very emptiness. Such a composition does not seem to live, but only to galvanize itself more and more desperately into some show of life and continuity. Next also leans to "Faust" subjects. One piece, calling itself "a Characterbild (portrait of character) from the Faust Symphony," aimed to portray the gentle "Gretchen;" we do not think there ever could be anything so self-conscious, so unnatural, so full of striving for effect about that simple, loving, genuine creature of Goethe's finest and most human fancy. The worst of all, and positively devilish, was the "Mephisto Waltz." This is an illustration of a scene in Lennau's Faust, where Mephistopheles appears in the midst of a village festival, and the devil himself persuades them to let him be piper, and has it all his own way. Such music is simply diabolical, and shuts out every ray of light or heaven from whence music sprang. "When Music, heavenly maid, was young," she was not so demoralized and had not learned such antics. Let us thank Heaven for her everlasting youth, despite this premature old age of the "Future."

—But Thomas gives us real music also; so we need not fear. And had we room, we would do what we meant to do, try to express in full our sense of obligation for the admirable examples he has brought us of orchestral interpretation, and our conviction of the great good which such an orchestra, visiting all the musical centres and sub-centres of the land, is doing, must do, in awakening a taste for music of the highest kind. It has justly been called "missionary work."

ORGAN CONCERTS. In the fine autumnal afternoons (on Fridays) many lovers of good organ music have been tempted to walk over to the beautiful First Church in Berkeley Street, to listen to the Free Organ Recitals of Mr. EUGENE THAYER, who there has charge of one of the finest organs in this country, built by Walcker of Ludwigsburg. These were a revival of the "recitals" given by Mr. Thayer, to the number of sixteen, last Spring. This time he has given six more, with so much admirable matter in the programmes that we have much regretted our inability to be present. The least that we can do is to record the programmes. Mr. Thayer's young pupil, from New Haven, who bore part in all of them, is said to manifest rare talent for the organ.

Orgel Studien. No. 4.....Schumann.
Fugue in G minor, No. 1.....Bach.
Master Shelton.
Variations in A, Op. 47.....Hesse.
Andante from Fifth Sonata, Finale from Sixth Sonata.
Mendelssohn.
Concertants in C minor.....Thiele.
Master Shelton.

We are glad to see that these feasts of organ music are to be resumed "on the return of the pleasant spring-time."

NEW YORK. The Philharmonic Society has issued its prospectus for the season. The chief instrumental selections are the following:

Symphonies.
No. 8.....Beethoven.
No. 4.....Haydn.
D major.....Mozart.
E flat major.....Schumann.
Ocean.....Rubinstein.
Im Walde (In the Forest).....Raff.
Tasso.....Liszt.
Posthumous (unfinished).....Schubert.

Overtures.
Tannhäuser.....Wagner.
Auerbach.....Cherubini.
Ruy Blas.....Mendelssohn.
Carnival Roman.....Berlioz.
Macbeth.....Hindemith.
Idomeneus.....Mozart.
Sakuntala.....Goldmark.
Aladdin.....Reinecke.
Fingal's Cave.....Mendelssohn.
Medea, F minor.....Bergel.
Im Hochland ("The Highlands").....Gode.
Scherzo and Finale.....Schumann.

The first public rehearsal will take place on the 11th, and the first concert on the 26th of November.

The "Euterpe," a new Society, had its first public rehearsal and concert on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons of this week (same times as our "Harvard"), with this programme:

Pastorale Symphony from "Christmas Oratorio".....Bach.
Cantata Domino, Ps. 93, Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.
Orie B. Boies.
Rhapsodie, Piano and Orchestra.....Otto Singer.
125th Psalm, Tenor Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.
F. Hiller.
Grand Fantasia Militaire, Violin Solo.....Leonhardt.
Master Willis Hesse.
Responsorium et Hymn, for male voices, with Cello and Contra-bass obligato. Unpublished MSS.
Mendelssohn.
N.B.—Every number, except 5, first time in America.

The character and plan of the "Euterpe" are thus explained in the New York journals by its Director:

The "Euterpe" is a musical organization consisting of a chorus limited to fifty well-trained professional singers, and an orchestra comprising some of the best instrumentalists in the city. It is intended, the necessary encouragement being supposed, to keep this organization in readiness to fulfil engagements for special occasions, upon timely application for their services.

One of the chief aims of the "Euterpe" is the recognition of resident musical talent, by the performance of scholarly works of resident composers, without favoritism, and without regard to nationality.

The undersigned, director of the "Euterpe," accordingly invites the attention of composers residing in America to the following proposals:—

The "Euterpe" offers to perform, in the course of each season, at its subscription concerts, seven works of resident composers, to wit:

Two Motets without accompaniment.
Two works for chamber music, Sonatas for Pianoforte, with accompanying stringed instruments, being preferred.
Two compositions for orchestra.

One cantata, or psalm, for chorus and soli, with orchestral accompaniments; such composition not to require more than one hour for performance.

The conditions upon which these works will be performed, are the following:

1. They must be new, i. e., they must never have been performed previously in America.
2. They must be sent before the 1st of September of each year, to Mr. John P. Morgan, at Trinity Church, New York, carefully copied, and accompanied by at least one set of separate parts, for trying them in case of necessity.
3. The tempi must be carefully indicated for the Metro-nome.

The various works received will be subjected to a careful and impartial examination by a committee of the Morris Hauptmann Club, and those of each class selected as the best adapted for the purposes of the "Euterpe," will be advertised by the accompanying signs as accepted for public performance; hereupon the respective composers may prove authorship by producing the original MSS, after which each work so selected will be performed at one public rehearsal, and at one concert in New York, and at a corresponding rehearsal and concert in Brooklyn.

N. B. Evidence in any work of a want of thorough knowledge of the general laws of musical composition, will be considered an insurmountable objection to the performance of such work.

JOHN P. MORGAN.
Director of the "Euterpe."

THE BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY had its first public rehearsal of the season last week. It was given in the usual place, with about sixty performers, under the direction of Carl Bergmann. The grand Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was played remarkably well, considering that the band now take up their instruments for serious work for the first time since the summer vacation; and one movement, the allegretto, was so perfect that Mr. Bergmann did not find it necessary once to interrupt it. The second selection was Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, a finely instrumented work, belonging to the new school, but not to its more frenzied subsection, and interesting to the popular ear chiefly for a beautiful violoncello solo, which is exquisitely played by Mr. Bargner. Hector Berlioz closes the programme with his spasmodic overture to "Les Francs-Juges." As the readers of the daily papers were treated, when the "Sakuntala" overture was first played in New York, last season, to various acute remarks upon the felicity with which Goldmark had illustrated the "wied," "misty," and "romantic" Teutonic legend, it may not be amiss to remark that the "Sakuntala" is the best-known of all Hindoo poems that have ever been translated into English—an episode of the great epic, the "Mahabharata," having as much to do with wierd Teutonic legend as it has with the "Song of Solomon."—Independent.

PHILADELPHIA. Mr. Carl Wolfsohn will give his usual series of concerts in the foyer of the Academy of Music this winter. The following are the programmes for the entire season:

First Matinée, Friday Afternoon, Nov. 11, 1870.

Trio, B flat major.....Bergel.
Nocturne.....Chopin.
Impromptu.....Chopin.
Two Melodies, for violin.....Wolfsohn.
Morte (Lamentation).....Gottschalk.
Marche Militaire.....Tausig.

Second Matinée, Friday Afternoon, Dec. 9, 1870.

(Beethoven Memorial).

Sonata, D minor, op. 31.....Beethoven.
Sonata Appassionata, F minor, op. 57, second period. " Adelaide....."
Sonata, C minor, op. 111, third period....."

Third Matinée, Friday Afternoon, Jan. 6, 1871.

Sonata, A major, Piano and Violin.....Raff.
Impromptu, B flat major.....Schubert.
Ballade and Polonaise.....Vieuxtemps.
Transcription, Weber's Invitation to the Vale, new.
Tausig.

Fourth Matinée, Friday Afternoon, Feb. 3, 1871.

Sonata, A minor, Piano and Violin.....Rubinstein.
Valse Etude.....Raff.
Rhapsodie.....Liszt.

Fifth Matinée, Friday Afternoon, March 3, 1871.

Trio, C minor.....Raff.
Polacca, B flat major.....Weber.
Elegie.....Ernst.
Fantasia, C major, op. 17.....Schumann.

Sixth Matinée, Friday Afternoon, April 1, 1871.

Fantasia, C major, Piano and Violin.....Schubert.
Etude de Concert, C major.....Rubinstein.
Ungarische Weisen.....Tausig.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO.—Among the signs that this city is advancing somewhat into a deeper musical life, I am able to mention the organization of the "CHICAGO QUINTETTE SOCIETY" which gave its inaugural concert Oct. 18th, with the following programme :

Grand Trio in D minor, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, Op. 49.....Mendelssohn.
Romanza for Tenor, "La Stella Confidente".....Bosch.
Quartet, No. 7, for Strings.....Mozart.
"The Lord's Prayer," for Tenor.....Tietset.
Air Varié, for Violin, Op. 12.....De Beriot.
Quintet, Op. 44; for the Pianoforte and String Quartet.....Schumann.

The heavy numbers of the programmes were well chosen, as you will see, although the programme was too long. Musically regarded, the debut was a success. The Mendelssohn Trio went admirably. The Strings were not above reproach, yet the players are all good musicians and fond of this kind of music, so it is no more than kind to charge shortcomings to inexperience. The Club played together with great precision, and with good sympathy in expression. More allowance was to be made for the slow movement in the Mozart quartet. Here success is attained only by the most complete and heartfelt interpretation of the score, and it was evident that more years of experience, and perhaps a change or two, would be necessary before the Society could bring Quartet playing to the high standard of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Strange as it seems, the pianoforte was the real soul of this concert; yet the instrument itself (Hallet and Davis) was to my ear not sympathetic in tone, and this leads me to speak of the personality of the Society.

The manager and chief promoter is Mr. Charles Tietset, who is also pianist. The tenor songs were sung by Mr. Eugene Tietset. These two brothers came here about two years ago from Italy. They were born in England, I believe, moved early to Leipzig, where they pursued musical studies in the conservatory, and afterwards went to Florence, (I think), where they studied singing. In feeling they are strictly cosmopolitan, speaking fluently English, French, Italian and German; enthusiasts for art, and of the most unexceptionable domestic habits. Mr. Chas. Tietset has considerable literary taste, and has rendered valuable aid to the Musical Independent and to the Tribune, in the way of clippings, translations, and abridgments from European musical journals. He made his first public appearance here last year at a symphony concert, playing Weber's Concertstück with orchestra. He has also been very much in demand for parlor concerts, etc. As a pianist his rank is much higher than I thought. His technique is flexible, he plays octaves beautifully, and his touch is very expressive; so that, take him all in all, I can but regard him as a valuable addition to our city, giving promise, especially, of piano recitals, of which we stand much in need. The violinist, Mr. Allen, is from Leipzig (as to his education), but lacks fire. His tone is good, and his execution adequate. The Violoncello, Mr. W. Eichheim, is also good, but not great.

The second concert occurs Nov. 3d, and the programme is good. I am sure you will join with me in wishing the Society Musical Health, Pecuniary Wealth, and physically a Long Life.

Mr. Dudley Buck gave his second Organ Recital, Tuesday night, October 25. The programme was :

Grand Prelude in C major.....J. S. Bach.
Adagio from the String Trio, Op. 8.....Beethoven.
Sonata in G major, Op. 38.....W. T. Best.
Largo. Allegro con Brío. Andante with Choral-Intermezzo. Fugue Finale.
Scenes from "Lohengrin".....Wagner.
a. Elsa's Dream; b. Bridal March; c. Duet (Elsa & Lohengrin).
Theme, Variations and Finale, in A flat.....Thiele.
Rondo Grazioso.....Spohr.
Overture to the "Water Carrier".....Cherubini.

The Bach prelude was the one beginning of which Mr. Buck is very fond. The most notable feature of the programme was, of course, the great Theme, Variations and Finale by Thiele, which is of the very highest degree of difficulty. The performance was not only mechanically unexceptionable, but characterized by so great a degree of artistic enthusiasm as to carry the piece with the audience, so that what promised to be the most formidable number on the programme became a real enjoyment. Mr. Buck is the only one of our organists who has undertaken to present to us these Thiele pieces. He has played several times the Concertsatz in C minor, and I confess I find it interesting, but after a reverent inspection of the notes, I do not feel drawn to it as a desirable field of practice. These recitals are given in Mr. Buck's Music Room, a little hall about 25 ft. x 50, in which he has the three-manual Johnson Organ (Op. 318) of which I wrote you an account last year. The instrument has seven stops in the Great Organ, six in the Swell, six in the Choir, and three in the Pedale. There are eight or ten composition pedals. The selections of stops are well made, so that, practically, Mr. Buck has abundant resources at his command to render these recitals satisfactory. He has adopted the very sensible practice of prefacing the more important pieces with a few explanatory remarks, which serve the important purpose of introducing unknown composers, and giving the listeners a clue to the proper stand-point from which to judge unfamiliar works.

October 26 and 27 the CONCORDIA MAENNERCHOR repeated the "Magic Flute" for the benefit of the Prussian wounded soldiers. The orchestra numbered about fifty, (eight first violins, etc.), and for the most part played beautifully, thanks to Mr. Grosscurth, the new Conductor who came here last year. Pamina was given by Mrs. Clara Huck, the wife of a wealthy gentleman here. Mrs. Huck was born to the stage, her father being manager in a German theatre, and her presence is characterized by that ease and grace which only experience can give. Personally she is a very beautiful lady, (I judge only from her stage appearance), and in point of song is a prima donna of a high order. Were it not that comparisons are odious, I could make some in a high degree complimentary to this lady, for it is but simple truth to say that in beautiful singing, easy acting, graceful, pleasing and modest presence, we have not heard a more satisfactory prima donna here in a long time.

The part of Queen was taken by Mrs. Lang-Zeigler, who sang the music well, very wisely avoiding the notes above high C. Sarastro was done by Mr. Hoffman, a cigar-merchant here (as to secularities), who has a ponderous bass voice, which he used with good effect except in one air, "In diesen heiligen Hallen," when he went fearfully out of tune. Tamino was Mr. Bischoff, our best tenor, who sings in Mr. Baumbach's choir. His presence was a little "stagey." If Mr. Bischoff would do a little pedal practice, or take some other exercise to limber up his legs a little before his next public appearance, it would be an advantage. Of his singing I have nothing but commendation to record. Mr. Foltz was Papageno, and a most amusing one he was. Mr. Foltz is a thick, well-fed looking engraver, who also sings in Mr. Baumbach's choir, and his appearance was entirely in his favor. The chorus work was superb. There were over eighty singers. The Concordia is an institution of which Chicago has a right to be proud, and we greet them.

If space permitted I would speak of the inauguration of the Organ at the Jesuit Church of the Holy Family. This is the largest church organ in the United States, but in point of real effectiveness it must be classed below several others. Indeed, I would rather have the one that Mr. Thayer plays, although it is much smaller. But enough.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Looking Back. 4. D minor to d. Sullivan. 40

A very beautiful contralto song, sung by Miss Annie L. Cary. The tender poetry of Louisa Gray is set to an appropriate melody, and the accompaniment is fitted in a masterly manner.

"I heard a voice long years ago,
A voice so wondrous sweet and low,
That trembling tears unbidden rose
From the depths of love's repose."

The Free the German Rhine. Solo with Chorus. 3. C to e. Schumann. 30

A popular German song which stirs the heart in Fatherland.

Lord Help us. Sacred Song. 3. F to f. Miss Philp. 30

"Mount on the wings of prayer!
Cold is the earth, and dead!
Mount into heav'n's pure air
By calls of Mercy led!"

Lonisette. A French Ballad, with English and French Words. 4. Bb to g flat. Arnaud. 35

"As the evening saphyr's fitting,
And the sunset shadows fall,
Lonisette was dreamily sitting
By the brookside in the dell."

Say, oh beautiful maiden. Barcarolle. 4. E to f sharp. Gounod. 40

"Say, oh beautiful maiden,
Where will you stray with me;
Zephyr's, fragrantly laden,
Waft our bark o'er the sea."

Instrumental.

Home, Sweet Home. For the Left hand. 6. Db. Wehli. 60

A correct copy of this celebrated player's transcription, with an explanatory note.

The Sleigh Ride. 6. Db. Wehli. 75

A characteristic piece, bringing to mind the merry jingling bells with galloping steed. Not containing technical difficulties usually characteristic of Wehli's pieces.

La Harpe Aeolienne. 6. D. Wehli. 60

An Andante cantabile in a delicate setting of Arpeggios. It is an excellent pianoforte study.

Amy Louise Waltz. 4. C. Cable. 60

A melodious piece of no great difficulty.

Blondinette Polka. 3. A. Dias. 30

A good dancing polka for the parlor.

Königalieder. (Royal Songs). Waltzes. 4. F. Strauss. 75

Containing the excellencies of melody and harmony which distinguish all the compositions of Strauss.

Pat Malloy's Galop Quickstep. 2. C. De Pelchin. 30

Soirée Galop. 2. Eb. Fitz. 30

An easy piece for young players.

The Intellectual Influence of Music.

(From the Atlantic Monthly for November.)

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

Now here we have to meet perhaps the most respectable of all the phases of the scepticism with regard to music. It has its spring in certain sensitive consciences, perhaps intelligently, sincerely musical, but with a proneness to self-accusation when they find themselves enjoying. These, while they own their hearts are moved, as the flushed face and glistening eyes testify, while they admit the claim of music to be called the language of the heart, with power to melt, transport, instead of reasoning and convincing, appear to fancy that they but disparage it by such admission. They say it is a sentimental rather than an intellectual mood to which it ministers; that it is a matter of mere feeling and emotion; below the intellectual, the voluntary, moral principle, inferior to poetry, philosophy, or doctrine, since in it we simply yield ourselves to passive rapture. Strange if one could always enjoy tasting fruit, and never planting!

It is common to define music as the natural language of feeling, while words are the expression of ideas, of thoughts. And so, indeed, it is; but not in a mere sentimental sense; for do we not distinguish between music which awakens feelings wholesome, high, impersonal, and more allied to intellect than sense, enamored not with pleasure solely, but with truth, and beauty as a type and symbol of the highest truth,—and music which is shallow, maudlin, commonplace in its expression, attractive to the selfish, sentimental, vulgar mind? The truest feeling, such as true art, true music breathes and makes appeal to, is of a more intellectual temper. Heart quickens brain; then thought reacts on feeling, and carries it up to a sense of perfect order, to a holy love and yearning after unity.

It by no means covers the whole significance of music to call it the language of feeling; though, rightly understood, there might not be a higher definition. The poet truly sings:

"Thought is deeper than all speech, Feeling deeper than all thought."

But then he means the feeling which is "deep," and which relates us to the highest universal ends of being. Now musical art, to be sure, does not describe objects, nor narrate histories, nor unfold cosmogonies and systems of philosophy and ethics, as some imaginative exponents of "Ninth Symphonies" would have us think. It does not express ideas, except of the kind technically known as musical ideas, pregnant little germs of melody, capable of logical development in a way analogous to the development of thoughts. And here, by way of caution, lest we be misunderstood in claiming that music is intellectual and has meaning, we would take occasion once for all to wash our hands of all responsibility for that kind of musical interpretation which seeks to trace a story, a mythology, a thread of doctrine, throughout such or such a symphony, sonata, or "tone-poem"; and to express our conviction that music stoops from its proper, higher mission when it undertakes to describe scenes or imitate sounds in nature; and that it is never less intellectual, or more regardless of its own chaste integrity, than when it takes the form of "programme music," not trusting its own proper element, but borrowing chances of effect ab extra, and dividing the attention as if to cover its own insufficiency. Music must be sufficient of itself. The highest kind of music is pure music, that which lives and moves in purely musical ideas. Yet nothing is more natural than to try to describe the effect upon you of a piece of music by calling up such images, associations, trains of thought, analogous effects in other spheres, as it may have awakened in your mind. You clutch at all these feeble helps in your enthusiastic, vain endeavors to describe the witching thing. This you may do legitimately, so long as you profess no more, and do not try to reverse the order, and make it appear that the music was written to describe your thought. For here we find the true relation between thought and feeling in the sphere of music. Music in one sense describes, by awakening the feelings with which objects, thoughts, experiences, are inevitably associated; every such feeling may of course awaken many images and many memories in many minds; but there will be, at least, some vague analogy, affinity between them; so that music, even of the most pure and abstract sort (such as a stringed quartet by Mozart) is always heard to best advantage on the fit occasion. If it be wedded to words, as in a song, an opera, an oratorio, these in a measure must determine its expression, though it bring out new meanings such as the words alone could hardly have conveyed. Yet take the words away, the music could not be translated into them, would not enable you to find them, though it would put you in a state of mind and feeling in which those or kindred thoughts and words might offer themselves most aptly.

This brings us to the heart of the matter. Leaving objections, we come back to positive statement. The highest definition of music, its full significance and worth, is to be sought mainly in the highest kind of music; that is to say, pure music, dealing in purely musical ideas, conscious of no outward purpose, content in its own world, pre-occupied with its own peculiar mission, which is too divine to need the justification of any end to serve. This, indeed, is the first principle of truth in art of any kind.

In this we find the intellectuality of music. For music, in this view, is the most abstract, pure embodiment and type of universal law and movement. It is a key to the divine method throughout all the ordered distribution of the worlds of matter and of spirit. It is the most fluid, free expression of form, in the becoming (what the Germans call das Werden); form developing according to intrinsic and divine necessity. There is nothing arbitrary in music; no acquiring any power in it except by patient, reverent study and mastering of divine proportions and the eternal laws of fitness. Goethe says: "The worth of art appears most eminent in music, since it requires no material, no subject-matter, whose effect must be deducted; it is wholly form and power, and it raises and ennobles whatever it expresses."

Hence the study of the laws of fugue and counterpoint, the subtle art of what is called the polyphonic interweaving of the parts in harmony, the learning to develop out of a little melodic phrase of theme or motive, as from a seed thought, all the wealth of meaning and of beauty there concealed and waiting for the touch of fairy wand of genius, is at least as good a kind of higher intellectual gymnastics as the transcendental mathematics, or the categorical chains of logic, or the perpetually shifting, vanishing cloud forms of metaphysics. Good music has a logic of its own; none more severe, more subtle, and surely none so fascinating, for it leads, it charms into the Infinite.

Even to contemplate the elementary phenomena in nature, upon which all the wonders of the musical art are founded, is to find ourselves in presence of enchanting facts, of laws so intellectual, so inexhaustible in their suggestion, such startling revelations of an infinitely beautiful organic, all-pervading living order, that the soul is filled with awe as if the very air were tremulous with Deity. For what is music? Its substance common air. Its form vibration. All beauty, in whatever art, is the result, the impressed form of motion,—free, unimpeded, even motion; and motion, movement, is the universal sign and undeniable assertion of force, of power, of inspiration, in a word, of life; and, finally, all free, undisturbed motion is vibratory, undulating, measured, proportionate, rhythmical. Physically, then, music is motion, and it is nothing else. And nothing moves that does not impress upon the air a vibration, or (which is the same thing) a sound, a tone. If I sing to you, a vibration of my soul, my feeling, imparts itself to the atmospheric medium, travelling on until it becomes a vibration in your soul, your feeling. The spiritual fact of music answers to this physical fact. Its business is directly with the motive principle in human life, and not with thoughts, perceptions, memories; for these are passive, prompted by some motive force behind them.

Vibrations beget vibrations; a vibrating chord or column of air divides into vibrating portions of itself, whose tones a fine ear will detect, mysteriously, faintly blending, harmonizing with the parent tone as it dies out. Thus one tone generates a whole series of tones, and we have virtually all tones in one. The first begotten and the most distinctly audible are those two, which, on being reduced within the compass of one octave, form with the principal its third and fifth,—and then we have that never-fading miracle, the trichord, which is the soul and substance of all harmony. Hauptmann (quoting Goethe, "Jedes natürliche ist ein frisch ausgesprochenes Wort Gottes") says the trichord is "a word of God"; and who that heard the clear, fresh voices of ten thousand children in the "Coliseum," when they, after holding out a long, pure tone in unison, suddenly struck the blended tones of the trichord,—purity itself, like the white beam of "holy light" divided by the prism,—will not heartily agree with him? Three trichords, based respectively on the principal or keynote, its first "over-tone" or fifth, and the tone of which it is itself the fifth, give all the tones of the diatonic musical scale; in other words, the operative melodic scale is really a mingling of three harmonic scales or series of tones generated by the first vibration; and this trine origin, this "trinity" of the scale, carries in it the germ of all the possibilities of harmony, indeed, the whole beautiful secret of all musical development. Rhythm, too, lay coiled hidden in these same vibrations of the primal tone, and knew by instinct how to regulate the time career, the onflow of the tune, the composition as a whole, by measured intermittent stress or accent, so that it all should run in waves as uniform as the "tone-waves" of the air which waft the message of each single tone upon the ear. Given the diatonic scale, which tempts continually to modulation, change, excursion among tones; given beforehand, with it, that earlier, original, harmonic scale of tones first generated by the vibrations of a ground-tone ("over-tones") to hold this free propensity still back to unity, as well as furnish samples of most pleasing and harmonic intervals (thirds, sixths, etc.); add to these rhythm, and lo! Melody is born. And harmony is not far off: for can the stream forget its source? Here too, "the child is father of the man." And now is music fully armed, to leap forth like Minerva from the brain of Jove. Now out of the harmonious strife of melody and harmony we presently shall see spring up all sorts of kaleidoscopic hints of imitation (themes, motives, bits of motives, echoed or reflected from one part to another of the harmony); sharp-flavored passing discords, piquing expectation, pressing to solution; all the arts of polyphonic interweaving of the parts, each part pursuing its own independent, individual, melodic way, yet all enforcing, celebrating the one common theme, co-operating to one end; in short, the whole development—as beautiful and wonderful as growth of plant or crystal—of counterpoint and fugue and all the inner structural and outer architectural varieties of form which music has from time to time assumed, and some of which she cherishes forever; till, donning finally her rainbow robe of many colors, she thrones herself upon the orchestra and shines forth in her crowning glory in the consummate form of forms, the Symphony.

Thus logically, as tree from germ, out of the first tone ("word of God") that ever rang, may we deduce the art of music in its infinite varieties, all singing, pleading for and prophesying UNITY, as the grand hope of human mind and heart, the highest word of science and religion. Here is no room, of course, for the history, any more than for the theory of music. Yet this exceedingly brief hint of its origin, at least, was quite essential to our argument. Such origin and such development who can fairly contemplate, and for a moment longer doubt the intellectuality of music?

As there is nothing arbitrary in music of itself, in music as a science, so too there is nothing arbitrary, or merely accidental, in its true forms of art. And here, before concluding, we would dwell a moment upon two of the more important forms, which are too commonly imagined to be arbitrary experiments, inventions of one man, iudolently aped by others, fashions of too long a day, doomed to be swept away with other traditional rubbish of the past; but which we believe to have grown out of the very nature of things,—types moulded into shape by a necessity intrinsic and enduring.

The first is the FUGUE FORM. The fugue is the vital principle of musical form; it is the prime secret of all form, the very soul of it. Whatever music does not more or less imply the fugue, is likely to be poor and shallow music. For fugue is but the logical development of what is latent in a germ or theme. It is in music what the spiral law of growth is in the plant. It has its prototypes in nature: in the surf billows rolling up the beach; in the waves that run along a field of grain before the wind; in the widening vortex of the whirlpool and the waterspout; in the tongues of flame losing themselves and reappearing as the fire soars and seeks the sky. It has its correspondences in other arts; in nothing, perhaps, so strikingly as in those wonderful creations of religious architecture, which are the furthest removed from mere mechanics and geometry, which speak so to the soul and the imagination, and almost seem alive and growing, as it were yearning, reaching, soaring upwards while we look at them,—the old Gothic churches. There we see the fugue in solid form; that is what Madame De Staël meant when she called architecture "frozen music"; there we find the same precision of minute detail, the same endless echoing and imitation of motives and parts of motives, phrases, with quaint particulars; a thousand pointed arches, clustered columns, cunning tracery, and, peeping out of unexpected corners, exquisite or grotesque shapes of plants, of men, of animals, and monsters, as if to include all the images that ever filled the waking thoughts or dreams of man in history,—all aspiring, growing to a climax, yet to the mind still hinting further growth, still seeming in the process of becoming, never absolutely done; utmost finish in detail mechanically, actually, but ideally suggesting still the Infinite, the unattainable in time. This suggestion of the Infinite is what we would call the expression of the fugue. (Only, to be expressive, it must be a fugue of genius.)

Yes, in music, the fugue is the perfect type of unity in variety. It is nature's own law; the true instinct of genius felt it out, obeyed it unconsciously by the inmost necessity of art and of its own soul. True to nature, genius could not do otherwise; it was simply letting germs, seed-thoughts (motives technically) grow. To be bound always strictly to the fugue form is pedantry;

but not to know it, not to feel it, not to imply it even in free composition, is to forsake the real fount of inspiration. All the great composers, the real creators whose works live forever,—Beethoven, for instance, who did not very often write fugues as such,—working by a true instinct with nature and the divine laws of essential form, or unity, still imply the fugue in whatever form they write; they have its secret in them, its law is in their hearts, the soul of all their method; indeed, so familiar are they with it, that they need not literally present it. It lay at the basis of their culture. No one is fairly master of the free forms, until he is master of the fugue. That is, wherever there is harmony, wherever there is more than one part, true art dictates that the parts move individually, that there be some contrapuntal texture. Where Counterpoint sits down to work, Fugue looks over its shoulders.

And now we see why one never exhausts the interest of a good fugue. There have been plenty of mechanical, dry fugues, results of plodding calculation, ingenious, learned, but without much expression. But there are also live ones; a live one never gets hackneyed, never dogs and persecutes the mind like tunes in fashion, which the street-organs keep forever murdering, but will not bury. Mere melody has in it a principle of decay; it stales by repetition; and therefore the music that proclaims the Infinite, the great religious music from of old, has worn the undecaying form of fugue and counterpoint. For fugue treats its theme, develops, "works" it up in such a noble way that it becomes a perpetual renovation and new illustration of itself, and so invests it with perennial youth and freshness: it can no more bore you now than can the themes, the motives multiplied, repeated, echoed, imitated, or contrasted throughout the whole upward floating, spirit-like, scarcely material mass of a Strasbourg or Cologne cathedral. All its possibilities of repetition are provided for, anticipated in this structural development, this contrapuntal transfiguration, lifting it into a purer atmosphere beyond reach of the curse of commonplace, so that it cannot spoil. Right healthy music are the fugues of Bach, and hearty too; no sickly sentimentality there; no poor ambition for effect; but sincere expression always of deep, genuine religious feeling. To him the fugue form had become a native, pliant and obedient language, in which he could express himself most readily; and between one fugue and another of his there is a wide range of expression, from airy, fairy fancy to deepest tenderness, to holy meditation, to noonday brightness of sublimest joy. Expression you will find too, as well as learning, in many more of the old fuguists. A century before Bach, the fugues of Frescobaldi, chapel-master at St. Peter's, in Rome, breathe a delicate and tender sentiment. So do some by Bach's pupil, Kirnberger. Handel, too, was grand in fugue, but far less various than Bach. Nor was his nature quite at home in so interior and mystical an element. Mozart, consummate master in all music, could not write without expression. A deep, musing sort of feeling goes with subtle art in the fugues of the older Scarlatti. Then there were the sons of Bach; nor even in such types of learned and severe musicianship as Albrechtsberger and the Padre Martini is the fugue always dry and unsuggestive.

The fugue form pertains more to internal and organic structure in one homogeneous musical piece or movement. Our other example of form shall be one of what we may term architectural massing of several movements in a great symmetrical musical whole. Look at the SYMPHONY, or what is technically called the SONATA form, common to sonatas, symphonies, trios, stringed quartets, classical concertos, etc.

This form, too, we say, is not mere accident or imitation of one man's success beyond its reasonable term of life. The reason of it is to be sought in the nature of the human soul and in the corresponding nature of music.

How is it with us when a matter interests us and excites us to that pitch of feeling in which music steps in as the natural language? Our whole nature is engaged in it. The head, or thinking principle; the heart, or feeling, loving principle; the will, or active principle; and more or less (amid these earnest powers) the lively, recreative play of fancy,—all take part in it, all in turn are principally addressed by it. Reason, passion, frolic humor, will: these seek each its type and representative in the forms of an art so perfectly human and so pliant to the motions of the human soul as music. If a matter taxes our reasoning, truth-seeking faculties for one spell, it is a law of our nature that we then quit thinking and only feel about it for another spell. We modulate out of the dialectic into the religious and accepting mood. It was an argument, an emulous labor of the brain; it has become a lyric of the heart, a prayer, a hymn, a softly rising incense and aroma of the faith and love and longing in us. And then, the more we have been in earnest, the more naturally comes the reaction of frolic fantasy and humor, the more lively the suggestions and "heat-lightnings" of a quick, surcharged, midsummer fancy,—the scherzo humors that so often flash from characters of deepest pathos. But the circle of moods is not yet complete. Thought, feeling, fancy, are but phases of the living stream that yet must ultimate itself in action, must rush into deed, and so pour its life into the great ocean whence all proceed and to which all tend. That is the finale. Now for the musical correspondence.

The first, or Allegro movement of a symphony, takes up a theme, or themes, and proceeds to their discussion and elaboration. It begins with a principle theme or subject; presently, with the natural modulation into the dominant or relative key, comes in a counter theme; these two are developed and contrasted a little way, when the whole passage is literally repeated to fix them firmly in the mind. Then begins a sort of analytic canvassing of all that they contain; fragments, phrases of the one are blended with or offset against the other; the two propositions (often waking up a number of accessory subjects by the way) are subjected to a sort of exhaustive musical logic, till what is in them is brought fully out and verified. By a sort of refining, differentiating, intellectual argumentation these themes are held up in various lights, are developed singly and in contrast, and are worked through various keys, abridgments, augmentations, episodes, digressions, into a most various and complex whole, in which the same original threads or themes continually reappear, yet with perpetual sense of novelty. The intellectual principle delights in analysis, in the detection of differences and distinctions. So the symphonic Allegro betrays a tendency to continual divergence and escape from the first starting-point. Here is an art type of discussion, whose whole aim and tendency is unity and truth. What a type of catholicity in thought! Discussion, no denial; music is incapable of that; Mephistopheles in music must make sad work, or forget his nature.

Then comes the Adagio, Larghetto, Andante,—some slow movement, which has more of calm, still feeling and unquestioning religion in it. This is the central sanctuary in this musical abridgment of man's life, which every good symphony appears to be. This the heart; that the head.

The serious Andante passes,—sometimes directly, sometimes through the frolic Scherzo, or the minuet and trio,—into the rondo finale, which is rapid and full of the spirit and preparation for action, full of resolve and fire. The sentiment which has passed through the crucible of the judgment in the Allegro, and sought its divine repose at the religious altar of feeling in the Adagio, having traversed its intellectual and its affective phases, now puts on its armor and moves on with alacrity for action. (Though, in many lighter symphonies, it is more like a school-boy pulling on his cap and rushing out of doors in pure animal spirits.) It seems to act itself out with buoyant confidence; sometimes with sublime triumph, as in the march concluding the C-Minor Symphony.

Such is the model or typical form of a symphony, or a sonata. We do not say, all symphonies must closely conform to it; no two things in nature are precisely alike, no two leaves upon a tree, no two human forms or faces; but every one, with more or less divergence, illustrates its own proper type. And, be it remembered, we are citing only one of many admirable great forms of music,—greater and truer in that they are not arbitrary, but determined by intrinsic reason and necessity, and therefore enduring. Search into the secret, then, of musical form, and you will learn other secrets, learn much of yourself, of the divine organic method in the material and moral universe. Said we not rightly that music is as good a school for intellectual discipline as mathematics, logic, or philosophy?

But the superior potency of these studies in musical form appears in this; that they are æsthetical as well as abstract; they are imaginative and free in absolute obedience to law; they seek beauty as an end, and pour forth glowing feeling from the heart, while they so finely illustrate the method of the universe, the principle of one in all. And so (even without the theoretic study as such), by mere familiar intimacy with such forms, such music in the concrete, by frequent listening to the beautiful sonatas, overtures, and symphonies, till we become possessed with them, informed with their own spirit, our instincts get attuned into a sympathy with universal law and unity. Here is an intellectual culture, where intellect as it were rises into sentiment, and the two are henceforth one; where scientific, dry analysis blooms out and fructifies into poetic, loving synthesis. Indeed, may not this be, perhaps, the highest kind of intellectual culture; this cultivation not so much of reasoning or perceptive powers, as of the harmonic mood and temper; this disposing and attuning of the whole mind to law, to the perpetual embrace of truth in beauty?

At once emotional and intellectual in so pure a sense, music with good right has been called a universal language, and, above all, the native language (so to speak) of the religious sentiment. This aspect of the subject claims consideration, but not now.

The Strasburg Organs.

(From the London Orchestra.)

The far-famed organ in the Strasburg Cathedral—the masterwork of Andrew Silbermann—has suffered grievously from the recent bombardment of the venerated city. A shell made its way from the roof of the cathedral and delivered its contents in the very centre of this noble instrument. Had the Badeners or Bavarians simply blown the wind apparatus to pieces, or annihilated keys, draw stops, and pedal boards, no irreparable mischief would have ensued; but the destruction of the music of the instrument—the sweeping away of the heart and soul of its great originator, can only be likened to the burning of the Missal of the Abbess of Hohenberg—the incomparable Byzantine manuscript which has been lost by the conflagration of the Strasburg Library. The pipes of Andrew Silbermann can no more be renewed than can the earliest specimens of Faust, or the memorable Bibles of Eggestein and Mentelin—rarest among the rare—or the marvellous painted windows of the clerestory, the best and most esteemed examples of the art in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

Andrew Silbermann, the builder of the organ, and founder of a race of celebrated organ builders, was the son of a butcher in Franconstein in Saxony. He was born in 1678, migrated to Strasburg in 1708, where he lived, and worked, and brought up a large family during the twenty-seven years of his pilgrimage there. He died in 1754, four years after the death of Sebastian Bach, and five years before that of Handel. There are other organs in Strasburg of his work, one of the most perfect being that in the Protestant Church of St. Thomas, commenced by Andrew and continued by his son John Andrew, and perfected by his grandson.

On Sunday, the 9th instant, the Prussians, who appear to be a truly church-going soldiery, held their first service in this church, and on this occasion the organ was called into requisition. The service opened with the well-known soldier's hymn: "Jesus meine Zuversicht," and the roll of this superb instrument combined with the general congregational singing, was one of those things that live in the memory and are treasured up, as sunny landscapes in the field of past days. The lesson learnt is not so much the musical result, as it is the real Christianity of choral song, when rightly applied to the purposes of worship. It was not a case of ear-tickling, of organ jingle, or racing through a nursery ballad; nothing like what we hear in this country, the light, conventional, outward, and sensual, but a massive, clearly-cut hymn tune, devoid of all pomp and ceremony, and the very thing to make the heart gracious and the voice strong and melodious. And as it was with the tune, so it was with the accompanying instrument. In these days an organ is considered of small value unless it possess its Voix celeste and voix humaine, its flute douce and flute harmonique, octavante and pizzolo, its cor anglais, Solophon, muzette, and lieblich gedact; Old Silbermann, whether manufacturing for Catholics, Lutherans, or Calvinists, relied upon his diapasons, reed and chorus stops, and left the jeu celeste, cor de basset, and cromorne to the wit and ingenuity of his contemporaries and successors.

It is the fashion now to describe the Silbermann, the Gahler, and the Müller instruments as mediæval—efforts of dark, ignorant, fanatical, if not anti-Christian times; and the organ of modern days is thought to be one of the acoustical miracles of this most scientific of ages. But let us look at the outward presentation of the cathedral organ of Strasburg as it was,—an exquisite pendant, midway between roof and floor on the left side of the nave, with its choir organ in front, its beautiful wings, and magnificent corona as its highest top. Compare this effort with the work of modern times in the Royal Church of St. Denis, Paris, or anything of the best we may have in England. Turn from the Strasburg Cathedral organ to the marvellous rose window, the windows in the upper galleries, the circle of the astounding pillars supporting the towers and the nave—is it possible that such beauty of art should be on all sides, and yet no art and no beauty in the interior of this gigantic, yet delicate looking creature of sound? The list of stops gives little or no indication of power or variety; there are no more pipes than are to be found in ordinary organs of the size, no more keys, no more surface of sound. And yet the instrument breathes the very essence of harmony—the very loveliness of sweet song—a succession of solemn and affecting tones that at once reaches the heart, and subdues the worldly and unsanctified affection. The organ seems to be a creature of life—to be listened to with a reverential sense for its greatness and majesty, and yet also for its yearning tenderness for humanity and its necessities. The grand artist has left his heart in that rare specimen of his head and hand before us; he is yet alive there with all his wants, wishes, hopes and fears. We fancy we can see him, with frame strong as a lion, and features gentle as a lamb, looking down upon us, glad that we have the feeling to sympathize with the results of his toil, and to appreciate this legacy of his goodness. And the secret of his power is that he never thought of us, but that he worked like a true artist—and from the right standpoint—making his labor a real, spiritual, and heart-felt worship. To class the art work of the period of Louis XV. as mediæval is in itself absurd and ridiculous. The grand organ of this period culminated to perfection because it was wanted by the people, eager in their desire for congregational music; and solicitous, that with regard to the choral, it should be the best of its kind, and accompanied with as much of science as it was possible for organ builder or player to bring to bear upon it. And the fitness, beauty, and grandeur of the instrument are the results of this submission and obedience to the want—a want arising from the congregational desire to offer up a due and rightful act of adoration. Now-a-days we make organs to accompany weak and childish hymn tunes, devoid of all solemn feeling, and incapable of any grand harmonical clothing. All the emotions raised by music of this kind belong to the lower and merely instinctive faculties—creating a self-gratifying exercise—a serving of our own perverse and miserable tastes—a compound of littleness and vanity. Art of this sort is the very Lazarus of art, decking itself out in the purple and glitter of Dives. It seeks only to oblige its employer with his conventional notions or favorite ideas, and takes every pecuniary advantage of its position. The church, the parson, and the flock get so much wood and metal encased in some wretched harlequinade of wrong colors and wretched outline, and the organ builder vaunts of the superiority of his work in comparison with the imagined blind attempts of the real artist of the last century.

The secrets of success in the art of organ building, it would seem, have been quite lost sight of. The rare power of making grandeur of tone out of the smallest number of pipes, consistent with the intention, is now but little considered; the space necessary for such an instrument is made altogether an arbitrary affair; the height of the organ from the ground, its situation in regard to the building, the height of its roof, and the plane or base of its acoustical generation, are all subjects gone clean out of mind. The old organ builders made models of their organs—little organs in wood—and placed them on elevations, so that they could themselves judge of the effect of their work, and give their patrons something genuine and real, to criticize and estimate. In these days we get a pretty picture of an organ elevation on paper, and a long catalogue of stops, which means whatever the builder is able to do and no more. The specifications may abound with diapasons, and yet no true diapason be found in the instrument. The list of stops is a mere airy nothing, or the soft stops may be loud, and the loud soft. Organ phraseology is ever novel and romantic, ductile and picturesque. In seductiveness and supposed generosity it possesses a literature of its own. It distances all ingenuities in other trades, and defies imitation. It was not in this spirit that Godfrey built the organ for the Dresden Church, which he lived not to complete, but which was afterwards made so perfect by John Andrew. These men were not given to harlequinade or pironetting, and would have held in supreme contempt most of the superfetations of the present epoch. In a sense as canvas, paints, and brushes make a picture, so wind, metal, and wood make an organ, and wood, catgut, and wire a violin. But wood, catgut, and wire is one thing, and the same passed through the alembic of a Stradivarius a heaven sent thing, and no canvas, paints, or brushes can ever give us the burnt-up Venus by the angelic hand of a Titian. No work of art is of any high value unless it bears the impress of the artist's spirit. No music is worth a farthing unless marked by the individuality of the composer. No musical instrument is of any high estimation unless certain of conveying the speciality of its maker. The Erard pianoforte is one glory, the Broadwood another, the Collard another, and all are distinguished by their own peculiar and inimitable qualities. It is more especially so with the organ; for the wisdom, the far-sightedness, the quickness of apprehension, the pliancy and adaptability of the genius of the builder, have infinitely more scope, and field than the piano-manufacturer. No two organs are alike; and yet in one respect all work by the same hand is cognate and parallel, and perfectly distinct from the work of any other master spirit.

In these days our new organs are marked, not so much by what is in them, as by what is out of them, and which should be in them. We know a new organ to have been sent out of Brown's manufactory, because Brown always makes horny and coarse diapasons. We fix upon White as the builder of the next specimen, because White revels in squalling sesquialteras, mixtures, furnitures, and so forth; Black has a passion for washing tube, which he calls pedal pipes; and Yellow is noted for his terrific trumpets and clarions; Red is approved of for his curious and neat mechanism; but then Red has a poor notion of scales, and it is all haphazard with him when voicing a pipe. Shadow is afraid of a bright ensemble, so he kills off his scales, attenuates his combination stops, diminishes his soprano power, and in this way deprives his instrument of all strength and majesty. An organ cannot possess any beauty or weight of tone unless its scales be correct and all possible tone has been extracted from its pipes in a just and artistic way. Great tone such as was that of Grisi, Lablache, Staudigl, and other great vocalists of past days, was thoroughly legitimate; the all the artist could conscientiously do artistically and well. So it ought to be with every pipe amongst the four thousand of any large organ. And to represent this, every pipe must breathe the art and spirit of its maker, just as the violin tells us of the heart of a Stradivarius. And such were and are the organs of Alsace and those at Dresden; proclaiming in their clear, mellow, deep and bright tones the spirits of their creators, the family of the Silbermanns. We have in England those who are able to make their instruments by their spiritualistic power, and one especially who, by weight, breadth and solemn characteristics, always places an unmistakable brand upon his labor. Would we had more of his great and good points, and we would willingly put up with his comparative failings. The burning and destruction of so great a work of art as the Cathedral organ in Strasburg will test the power and merits of our Continental builders. To restore it may be impossible; to put new work of modern spirit alongside it would be a hazardous undertaking. To take the whole away and erect a complete new instrument would be a sorrowful mode of marking this great calamity. Germany has destroyed it, and Germany must make good in some way or other the mischief it has done. There are good organ builders in that country, but no Silbermann. What a pity it is that John Chinsman is no organ builder. He is the true fellow to make a perfect patch, if all he can see be the all necessary to do.

Liszt's strange and mystical Oratorio "Saint Elizabeth" (Die heilige Elisabeth), which so puzzled and enraged the London musicians a short time ago, was performed last Sunday evening by the Liederkrans.

A Musical Tour in North Germany.

- BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.—No. 5.*

(From the London Choir.)

It should have been stated in my last letter that before I left Leipzig I visited two very interesting establishments connected with the production and publication of musical compositions, viz., the engraving rooms of C. G. Röder, and the warehouse of the great publishing firm, Breitkopf & Härtel. As I have already intimated, there are several enormous music publishing houses in Leipzig, those of Peters, and Breitkopf & Härtel, being perhaps the largest. The latter I inspected, and was greatly impressed with that distinguishing mark of nearly all German work—political, artistic and social—an apparently perfect organization, which was evident here in a pre-eminent degree. Ascending the broad staircase of an immense building, which led also to other places of business, I came to the first floor of Breitkopf & Härtel's. The length of the first room seemed to be about one hundred feet, and it was divided and sub-divided into many different departments. Being an Englishman, upon stating the object of my visit, I was at once shown to the particular place where the information I needed could be best obtained; I noticed, too, that the German professors and others, who came on business whilst I was there, were, without the loss of a moment, promptly directed in like manner. For the purpose of observing how far their plans of arrangement of the enormous amount of works they publish were carried, I asked for different works by the great masters, and was instantly shown what I had desired to see. Pianoforte music was classed in one group of numerous shelves, divided and sub-divided; vocal music, organ, orchestral, etc., in others; every species of composition in their large catalogue was found and produced without the least delay. In another room were their excellent grand pianofortes, instruments of considerable power and sweetness, to be purchased at a much lower price than equally good ones in our country, though decidedly not superior, if equal, to the best specimens of Broadwood's and Collard's. I cannot say that on the whole this publishing firm showed a great and marked superiority over the largest English firms, but at the same time I think their system and wonderful management are thoroughly worthy of observation and record by those who feel interested in the matter.

With respect to engraving, the case is different, and I could not help seeing this during my visit to Herr Röder's establishment. Here, I think, the Germans are superior to the English, not only in the extent and completeness of the place itself, but also in the excellence and character of the work produced. Nearly all the important classical works, reprints of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, etc., have been engraved by Herr Röder. Every task connected with the engraving of music is effected in this building. Beginning on the ground floor, there are the stones roughly hewn, brought from the mountains, and wrought into the necessary shape and smoothness, for the purposes of lithography, by huge grindstones. On the next floor was an accumulation of tin and pewter for plates, which are prepared in another room to a certain thickness and consistency; they are then passed on to the next stage, where a numerous force of men and lads were engaged in punching, with neat and handy tools, the notes from the MSS. which stood before them. There were many of these rooms where the artisans were busily engraving all sorts of music. I was much interested and somewhat amused to be led up to a workman who was at that moment busily at work upon the latest number of the Organist's Quarterly Journal, the copy for which I had, as its editor, despatched from England shortly before my departure. All those who have seen this, and other works, engraved by Herr Röder, will at once acknowledge the beauty and accuracy of the work; the notes are sharper and clearer than those to which we have hitherto been accustomed in England, whilst the paper and printing ink are quite worthy of such good workmanship. Proceeding still further I came to the lithographic room, where thirty or forty men, women, and boys, were engaged in transferring the music to the stones; these stones being taken to a higher room, containing numerous printing presses, all of them being in full work.

In another part of the building were many hundreds of these heavy stones, placed in different niches with titles of various musical publications, which from their more elaborate and valuable character, are preserved, whilst the stones with impressions of music are rubbed and cleaned to receive fresh impressions. Amongst the numerous specimens of more beautiful and special engraving shown to me by Herr * No. 4 has not yet come to hand.

Röder, was a new Royal quarto edition of Beethoven's opera Fidelio, vocal score and pianoforte accompaniment. It was printed on toned paper with a large margin, and a superb title page, and a more exquisite piece of workmanship of its class I have never seen.

The journey from Leipzig and Dresden was performed, according to my custom in a part of the country possessing but few beauties of nature, by the evening mail. I have nothing to record of it excepting that I found, as usual, some at least of my fellow travellers were interested in the practice and progress of the musical art, and were able to add to my information many things of interest and use. On my arrival at Dresden on Friday at midnight, I soon found myself located at the magnificent Hotel de Sixe, which contains a splendid salle a manger capable of dining five hundred persons, where, in the winter season, numerous and special concerts are given. Early on Saturday morning I despatched a messenger to Herr Gustav Heintz the well known music publisher, with an introductory letter, and received a reply declaring his intention to visit me at noon. In accordance with the practical habits of the Germans, Herr Heintz acquainted himself with the chief objects of my visit, and at once made every arrangement to gratify my wishes to the utmost extent, and through his courtesy and kindness not much time elapsed before I had made the personal acquaintance of most of the leading organists and composers of Dresden. During the day, in his company, I visited most of the public buildings, and traversed the principal streets of this lovely city. Dresden is in every respect a charming place of residence, but especially for music loving people. Possessing numerous well-appointed theatres, concerts, cafés chantants, on both banks of the Elbe, in all of which music of a high class, well performed, is to be heard at very low prices of admission, there seems to be nothing omitted which could afford pleasure and delight to the musician, amateur, and visitor.

Finding that Weber's opera, or rather drama, Preciosa, was to be given in the evening at the "Zweites Theater," I proceeded there, and found the prices of admission to range from fifteen pence to threepence. Taking a reserved stall I witnessed an excellent representation of this celebrated work with no little satisfaction. The orchestra was not large, being chiefly composed of young artists, who, I was informed, played more to obtain experience than with a view to pecuniary profit. The heroine was played by a popular actress, Fräulein Hartmann. As a whole the opera was well performed; but the singing, both solo and choral, was not particularly good. There, as in every similar place in Germany, I noticed the remarkable attention of the audience to every detail of the performance. Between each of the acts one of those polite and handy German waiters, always found in such places, offered refreshment in the shape of a seidel of beer, a small bottle of Rheinwein, German sausages, and Westphalia ham sandwiches. I was surprised and amused to see that several of the fairer sex in the pit hesitated not to associate with other female companions in a seidel of beer, and evidently with infinite gratification, accompanying the same with loud and earnest criticism on the part of the performance just concluded; but the moment the curtain was drawn, and the play resumed, the utmost silence and decorum prevailed. At the conclusion of the opera, I found my way to a much frequented café, at the back of which, in the large and brilliantly illuminated gardens, I met, by appointment, Herr Meinardus, the composer, whose oratorios—St. Peter, and Gideon—and other works, are well known in the chief towns of Saxony and Hungary. Here it was that I heard the first war-note sounded: from an excited conversation amongst my friends, in which the names Napoleon and Hohenzollern were frequently uttered with considerable force and accent, I discovered the dispute, which, as is now well-known, led to the present lamentable war. As if not a moment should be lost I was awake at 3 a.m. on the following day, Sunday, by the roll of drums and mustering of troops in the square in front of the hotel. A more exciting scene of its kind I had never witnessed. In the deliciously cool, clear atmosphere of that early morning in July, the square was filled with soldiers, and during the preparations for marching, the magnificent band played two or three fine marches in a most effective and charming manner. I retired again to rest with the sounds of military music dying away as the soldiers fled off, and indulged in my dreams of no end of martial music.

At eight o'clock, before I had finished my toilet, I was astonished to receive a visit from my friend, Herr Gustav Merkel, whose organ compositions and performances are justly celebrated wherever they are known. He had called early, he said, in order to make me acquainted with the services at the Hofkirche, where he presides as court organist. I repaired at the appointed time to the church, which, unequal, however, to most of our cathedrals, has a noble exterior and a very fine tower. It stands in a prominent and beautiful position near the bridge which crosses the Elbe. Here high Mass is celebrated every Sunday at eleven o'clock, and other services, such as are usual at Roman Catholic churches, follow during the day.

The service on this occasion was most imposing, the large orchestra in the great West Gallery being occupied by about sixty performers (band and chorus), and the large organ, one of Silbermann's best instruments, of which I intend to give a description in my next letter. Crowds of people were pressing on, and it was with some difficulty that I gained an entrance, and obtained access to Herr Merkel's organ pew. The music consisted of a Mass in F minor, by the conductor, Herr Carl Krebs; an Offertory, by Rastrelli; and a Graduale, by Reissiger. With such a force of practical musicians, need I say that the music was given with thrilling power and effect? and I have no doubt that those who were below, in the body of the church, heard the inspiring strains to much greater advantage than I who was seated amongst the performers. At the conclusion of High Mass nearly all the immense congregation, as well as the members of the orchestra, departed, and there followed a short service, the musical part of which was sustained by about a dozen singing boys and singing men, with organ accompaniment only. I had now an opportunity of listening to the organ, and was struck with its rich, full tone. As, however, Herr Merkel's playing was limited to the requirements of the service, he made an appointment with me for the following Tuesday at ten o'clock in order that we might hear the instrument alone and undisturbed. Meanwhile the organist, with Herr Meinardus and myself, adjourned to one of the beautiful cafés on the banks of the Elbe, only a very short distance from the church. The prospect was one of great beauty and interest. Thousands of people were passing to and fro on the picturesque bridge; steamboats and every variety of craft plied up and down the broad river, whilst the patronizers of the cafés along its banks seemed thoroughly happy in the enjoyment of their refreshment and the scene. The heat was intense, and suddenly, with scarcely any intimation of the change, there broke upon us a fearful thunderstorm. Commencing with huge drops of rain, whose violence increased with extraordinary rapidity, it created for a time the greatest disorder, which, had it not been rather troublesome, would have been very amusing, for all seemed to vie with each other in their eagerness to snatch up their plates with their contents, wine, beer, etc., and rush, pell-mell, into the interior of the building, rolling out a running accompaniment of national gutturals. For two hours the rain descended in torrents and the atmosphere became thick and darkened. But notwithstanding this contretemps we had a most interesting conversation about music and organs; Herr Merkel being especially interested in the description I had with me, and explained to him, of the immense instrument in the Leeds Town Hall. It was there, as with all other organs I met during my tour; they knew nothing of English organs, English organists, or their compositions. I could not help expressing a hope that this exclusiveness should be rectified by visits to England: for clever as the organists of Germany at present are, they seem to be perfectly unacquainted with any but those of their own country.

In the afternoon I went to the beautiful little English church, erected chiefly by the liberality of Mrs. Göschen; there, on entering by a side door close to the organ, I heard the familiar strains of the hymn tune, "Malcombe." The young organist, Mr. David Beardwell, was extremely courteous, and most kindly offered to place his services at my disposal during my stay in Dresden.

THE FRENZY OF PRAISE. We take the following from the New York Sun, of Sept. 19.

An American girl, born near Plattsburgh in this State, and for several years the soprano at St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church at Albany, has created quite an excitement as a prima donna in Italy. She is of French descent, and her name is LA JEUNESSE, but in Italy she has assumed the name of ALBANI.

Our newspapers are sometimes rather lavish of their praise, and fail to temper their enthusiasm with the slightest particle of common sense; but for wholesale adulation and unlimited gush, commend us to the Italians. To judge from their own accounts, they have discovered in our young countrywoman such a singer as has not lived since St. Cecilia's time. One critic, a Signor BERTOLANA, said to be a writer of much repute, has an article in a late number of a Sicilian paper which fairly out Herodas Herod. It is the perfect phrenzy of praise. For such as may have a curiosity to know what America can do in the way of a singer, and Italy in the way of a worshipper, we reproduce a small portion of this sublimated puff. "The voice of ALBANI," says this enthusiast, "is one in which is felt the vibration of the seven chords of the eternal lyre." As we have never yet had the pleasure of hearing the eternal lyre, we are not in a condition to dispute Signor BERTOLANA's assertion; and as for the seven chords, they are not referred to in any thorough bass treatise with which we are familiar. "In short," continues the critic, "she is such an artist as inspires respect mingled with affection, and enthusiasm subdued by reverence. She is a morning-star—all light, all love. I renounce the idea of describing the benefit of last evening, the prodigies of ALBANI's throat in the 'Carnival of Venice,' the acclamations, the flowers, the crowns, the poetry, the gifts. The festival was worthy of the goddess of the occasion." The enthusiast also calls her "a ray of heaven," and expresses a doubt of "this eternal creature finding a heart worthy of her love out of the celestial spheres whence she descends." The audience and the populace in general seem to have shared the sentiments of the critic. We are informed that after singing the "Carnival of Venice," she "was recalled twelve times, and after the tenth recall nearly fainted from the wildness of the enthusiasm. She retired, and, after taking stimulants—nectar or ambrosia of course—returned to the stage, when all the audience rose, waving their handkerchiefs, and shouting 'Viva la prima donna Americana!'" When she went to take her carriage, behold, she found in its place a magnificent equipage with four horses, "the gift of noble admirers." "Bands of music and crowds of people preceded the carriage to her home, the crowds only dispersing after her appearance on the balcony." On the following day she left Sicily, waited upon by barons, counts, chevaliers, and their ladies. "She bade adieu to the crowd amid the loudest and most prolonged applause, which still continued when she was far on her journey."

Possibly they are still standing there braving their throats with vivas. We should have thought that nothing less than an earthquake or the eruption of Mount Etna could possibly have so excited the Sicilians. We very much fear that when she returns Miss LA JUNGESSER will find her own countrymen very cold blooded and unympathetic after these fiery and demonstrative Italians.

Music in New York.

THE FIRST REHEARSAL OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY is always an event of much interest. The Society is one to which New Yorkers look with pride, and the inhabitants of other cities with envy. In numbers and in the quality of its work it stands confessedly at the head of all the orchestras of the New World, and takes rank not far behind the most famous of those of the old.

Yesterday afternoon it gave its first rehearsal of the winter season; the first, also, under its new President, Mr. George T. Strong, who replaces Dr. Doremus. The most notable change under the new presidency is in the matter of the distribution of seats. In old times this was conducted on the strictly democratic principle of first come first served, then Doremus inaugurated the sale of the boxes. Mr. Strong has permitted all the eligible seats in the house to be secured for the winter. The consequence of this plan will be that there will be less confusion than of old, for every one will know exactly where to find his place. The famous, genteel, well-dressed crowd that used to gather on cold winter Philharmonic nights about the doors an hour before they opened, and to rush in a polite scrimmage for the best seats, is a thing of the past. The extra $3 secures one's seat for the winter both at rehearsals and concerts. As the same persons will occupy the same seats, it may fall to a man's lot to sit perchance all the season in close proximity to what Grandfather Smallweed used to call a "brimstone chattering," or perhaps with the same ugly bonnet in the immediate foreground, growing with each repetition more ugly. On the other hand, it is now possible for parties of friends to get together and enjoy that communion of feeling that music so specially invites. The pieces in rehearsal for the first concert are Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—one of the brightest and best of the immortal nine; Schubert's unfinished symphony: a musical torso as fine as the "Farnese Hercules;" and the "Tannhauser" overture, with its alternations of sublime and solemn thought, and squealing violin harmonies, and piccolo cries, that are as much like the utterances of a young pig under an unexpectedly tight fence as it is in the power of music to make them. Mr. Mills lends his assistance at the next rehearsal.—Sun, Nov. 12.

GERMAN OPERA. Mozart's little Opera "Der Schauspieldirector" (The Theatre Manager) was performed last week, for the first time, probably, in this country. The Weekly Review says of it:

It was for a festive occasion in 1788, that Mozart set the music to the above-named farce. As so many pieces which the masters of the last century wrote, so was this a pièce d'occasion. The plot is very simple, chiefly illustrating the trouble of a theatrical manager, and the rivalry of two leading prima donnas. The score consisted of but five numbers—an overture, which rises above the general bouffe character of the music, two arias, a trio, and the finale. It is chiefly the trio, which is as sparkling, humorous, and characteristic as anything Mozart has written, and which might serve as a model to our modern composers of opera bouffe. The piece was soon laid aside, but some thirty years ago revived by the well-known artistical manager of the Royal Theatre in Berlin, Mr. Louis Schneider. He conceived the idea of altering the text, and chiefly to illustrate the relations between Mozart and Schikaneder, when the former wrote his "Magic Flute," and also to ridicule the jealousy of the two leading songstresses of that time, Mmes. Lange and Cavalleri. Thus the interest centres around these four illustrious persons; and, although many objections have been raised as to the propriety of making Mozart appear in a somewhat ludicrous light, it must nevertheless be admitted that Mr. Schneider has succeeded in making a very funny arrangement of the old piece. To the original four musical movements he added four songs—also composed by Mozart—and one of which—"The Ribbon Trio"—is a very curious and exciting composition—a perfect jewel of humorous music. It was the arrangement by Schneider, which the German opera company produced the other night, at the Stadttheater, in splendid style, by Mmes. Lichtmay, and Messrs. Holst and Himmer, and for which every participant deserves the thanks of all who can appreciate opera bouffe in its best style.

"RIP VAN WINKLE."—In the same journal (of last Saturday) we read:

After a great many years Mr. George Bristow's opera has been reproduced at Niblo's, and if the present English opera company had no other claim to our consideration, than having revived this opera, it must be considered a powerful one by all who take an interest in the progress and culture of musical art in this country. Opera writing requires so many qualities, that it cannot but reflect credit, not only upon the author, but also the country to which he belongs. And, if it is done at all in a respectable, conscientious manner, with due consideration of the necessary artistic claims, it ought to be encouraged and honored by all possible means. That this is the case in the present instance, all know who have become familiar with the efforts of Mr. Bristow. Of the very few American composers who have attained a certain facility in handling the larger forms of compositions, especially in reference to writing for an orchestra, Mr. Bristow stands foremost. Every measure of his music shows the thorough musician, brought up in a good school. It is fluent, good, respectable music, a credit to the man who has composed it. But the question arises, whether it is good dramatic music, whether the salient points of the drama have been hit upon by the composer in such a manner as to produce, in the listener, a climax of interest. This, we are afraid, is not the case in the present instance. The fault lies not altogether with the composer, but with the text. In our opinion, Rip Van Winkle ought to have been made the centre of interest. Instead of this, we find that, during one whole—and very long—act, he does not appear at all, and we are bored with a very tedious love story. Besides, the text does not furnish sufficient scope for ensembles and finales. It gives us ballads, duets, etc., in abundance, but we all know that nothing is more tedious than a so-called ballad opera. Modern opera writing means a strong dramatic accentuation, much coloring, and strong contrasts. Where all this is wanting, even the greatest flow of melody will be of no avail. We are confident, that if Mr. Bristow would write his opera to-day he would show us by his music that he is of our opinion; and we hope and trust, that, encouraged by his present success, he will compose another opera. His country has a right to expect this from him.

The performance was as smooth as it can be with such an orchestra and such a conductor, as allied to the present company. Mr. Henry Drayton (Rip), and Mrs. Richiogs-Bernard were, as usual, excellent.

Music in Philadelphia.

Miss ANNA JACKSON announces the continuance of her popular parlor concerts during the present season. In her circular she says: "It is with increased satisfaction in the continued progress of the String Quartet, composed of Messrs. C. Gulemann, Wm. Stoll, Jr., Theo. Boettger and R. Hennig, that I announce the eleventh season for the Parlor Concerts. As the object of the concerts is, if possible, to render permanent this organization, it must be distinctly understood that the main interest of the concerts centres in it; at the same time there will always be standard selections of piano works, with solos for violin and violoncello. Should the subscriptions admit of it, it will give me much pleasure to add some singing to the programmes. The string quartet to be performed will be selected from the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert. The piano concerted works from those of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Raff. The second concert will be devoted entirely to the works of Beethoven, in honor of the centennial anniversary of this great composer. The concerts will be given as heretofore at Natatorium Hall, on the evenings of Saturday, November 26th, Monday, December 19th, Saturday, January 14th, Saturday, February 11th, Saturday, March 11th, and Saturday, April 15th.

For the first concert the following programme has been prepared:

String Quartet. No. 8, F major. . . . .Mozart.
Sarraband. . . . .J. S. Bach.
Ballade. . . . .Golttermann.
Mr. R. Hennig.
Quartet. Piano, Violin, Viola and Violoncello, op. 47.
Four movements. . . . .Schumann.
Song Without Words. . . . .Mendelssohn.
Le Courier. . . . .Theo. Ritter.
Mr. G. Gulemann.
String Quartet. F major. Op. 18. . . . .Beethoven.

BETHOVEN SOCIETY. The prospectus of this Society announces that two concerts will be given during the present season: on the 7th of December the Beethoven Centennial, and upon some day in April next. The first concert will consist of performances of the following of Beethoven's works:

Hallelujah Chorus, from the "Mount of Olives."
Quartet from "Fidelio."
Devotional Song, "The Heavens are Telling," with orchestral accompaniment.
Trio, Tremate, Empj, Tremate.
Choral Fantasia.
Violin Concerto.
Andante and Finale in C-minor symphony.
Overture to "Egmont."

The Society was organized and trained and will be conducted by Carl Wolfsohn. It has a splendid chorus, well represented in all the parts, and at its concerts it will have an orchestra of fifty first-rate instrumental musicians. The second concert, in April, will include selections from Schumann, Rossini, and others, together with Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm. These concerts will be private.—Eve. Bulletin.

CARL WOLFSON'S first Matinée, on Friday of last week, presented the following matter:

Trio, B flat major, op. 37, new. . . . .Bargiel.
Messrs. Wolfsohn, Stoll and Hennig.
Aria, "Maria Rudens." . . . .Donizetti.
Mrs. Sauvan.
Nocturne, B flat major. . . . .Chopin.
Allegro Impromptu, G flat major. . . . .Carl Wolfsohn.
Evening Song. . . . .Wolfsohn.
Farewell Song. . . . .
Mr. Wm. Stoll.
Morte, (by particular request). . . . .Gottschalk.
Carl Wolfsohn.
Ave Maria. . . . .Luzzi.
Mrs. Sauvan.
Marche Militaire. . . . .Tausig.
Carl Wolfsohn.

First Symphony Concert.—Sixth Season.

Of the many musical events of these last weeks this properly deserves first mention, as being the opening of our chief series of standard concerts, representing our own best and constantly renewed effort to build up for ourselves something permanent and worthy in the purest sense of Art,—something independent of the fashions and excitements of the moment, and which we can rely upon from year to year for opportunities of hearing what is intrinsically best in music. The interest, the enthusiasm which shall support and cherish such an effort is of a more quiet, deep, enduring nature, than that excited by the arrival of a new celebrity, and by the dazzling announcements of speculating impresarii. It behooves us to cherish and to guard with jealous love the nascent institution, amid so many transient, distracting invitations, if we would find and keep any sure foothold anywhere in our artistic culture.

But there seems to be little cause for fear. The sixth season of ten Symphony Concerts, so successfully begun and carried on under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association, opened on Thursday Afternoon, Nov. 3, with a list of season subscribers almost as large as that of last year, when it exceeded 1,600,—and this notwithstanding the increased price, the pre-occupation of the musical interest during the whole preceding fortnight by the Thomas Concerts, as well as the excitement about the coming of Christine Nilsson, whose Boston debut was announced for the very next night. Moreover, a sudden thunder storm, with heavy rain, in just the hour before the concert, doubtless deterred from coming many suburban music-lovers who had set their hearts upon it. As it was, the audience was very large and (there is no need of saying it) of the best kind. It was peculiarly a Beethoven concert, in accordance with the plan, already described, of dedicating the whole series in some sense, directly or indirectly, to the memory of Beethoven in this season of his Centennial Birthday. The opening programme was selected with this view, as follows:

Inaugural Overture ("Welche des Hauses"), in C. Op. 124. BEETHOVEN.

*Sacred Songs, to words by Gellert, Op. 48. BEETHOVEN.

"The Heavens proclaim the glory of God."

Song of Penitence and of Trust. M. W. Whitney.

Piano-Forte Concerto, in G, Op. 58. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro.—Andante.—Rondo.

Hugo Leonhard.

*Prelude to the Third Act of "Medea,".....CHERUBINI.

**Bass Aria: "Give me back my dearest Master," from the St. Matthew Passion Music, (the orchestral accompaniment completed by Robert Franz).....BACH.

M. W. Whitney.

(The Violin Solo by B. Listemann.)

Fifth Symphony, in C minor, Op. 67.....BEETHOVEN.

Allegro.—Andante.—Scherzo and Finale (Triumphal March.)

Some of the critics have qualified their great praise of the concert, both as to matter and to execution, by a regret that the programme was too uniformly "sombre." Let us see. The Overture is not sombre, it is majestic, jubilant, triumphant; and the orchestra (numbering about sixty in the absence of the Quintette Club) gave out the grand chords of the introduction with such a breadth and rich sonority as we had not heard for a long time; the quick fugato movement, too, was full of life and spirit, although there is yet something to be desired in point of perfect uniformity of phrasing in the violins.

Of the two short sacred songs, which Mr. WHITNEY sang in his best voice (transposing them of course) and with nobility of style, the first is simply grand, uplifting to the soul; the second, after a strain of tender, deep-felt penitence—extremely beautiful—ends with a rapturous outburst of hope and joy in the thought of the divine mercy; the very lively, and by no means easy piano accompaniment to this was finely played by Mr. LEONHARD.

The Concerto in G is certainly not "sombre." It is the most poetic, fascinating, lovely of all Concertos; full of delicate, fine fire; abounding, the Allegro at least, with a bravura which is the very efflorescence of a fancy all inspired with feeling. An indefinable charm pervades the movement. The Andante is serious, but not "sombre;" the musing, rapt cantabile of the piano, alternating with the stern unison of the orchestra, opens such glimpses of eternal peace and bliss beyond the stars, that you are unwillingly aroused from the delicious reverie; so short, so much! The vision is succeeded in the Rondo by the utmost elasticity of bright, exulting confidence as of a renewed youth, every nerve and fibre strung up to a quick and thrilling sense of finest life. Mr. LEONHARD interpreted this composition so satisfactorily four years ago, that there seemed nothing of poetic conception, feeling, purity, vitality and grace of execution left to be desired; this time he was even more fortunate, not only in his own part, but in a more sympathetic orchestral accompaniment, and in a remarkably responsive instrument, one of the most admirable of Chickering Grands, which it was inspiring to hear after the New York substitutes which had so long occupied the Music Hall. The Cadenzas introduced by Mr. Leonhard were the usual ones by Moscheles,—quite effective, yet not just what one would imagine Beethoven himself to have made. Could that Concerto, so played, possibly weigh "heavily" upon any spirit at all musically appreciative? On the contrary its whole influence is uplifting, quickening; it lends wings to the weary soul, on which to soar and realize for once its native heavenly freedom.

Past on now to the glorious old C-minor Symphony: brave, hopeful, heaven-cheered struggle, from the first, with destiny; in the Andante, lofty, holy, a divine song of high calling and encouragement, sounding as from within the deepest depths of the rapt hearer's inmost soul, where only one may find God; then the exciting Scherzo, big with impatient life and with mysterious, sure promise of the coming glory, and then the all-embracing, inexhaustible, restless triumph of the march-like Finale. What is there "sombre" about that? or what of heaviness to weigh one down? Such full-freighted vessels, bearing magnificently onward, only buoy us up, whereas the flimsy little cockle shells in which we seek to skim leisurely and miscellaneous over life's deep sea, too often entail bitter, belittling vexations, making the heart heavier with a sense of emptiness and nothing found, nothing of new faith or love or hope to carry home. One wearies soonest of things light and trivial. If you would have us listen all alive to a programme of music, give us great things. This we are pretty sure to get when the name of Beethoven occurs often. Nor could there be a greater or a sifter finale to a Beethoven programme than this same Fifth Symphony, which, we may safely say, was brought out this time with a degree of spirit and impressive grandeur scarcely excelled in any of the many renderings it has had in this for many years Beethoven-loving city.

Indeed it would be hard to name any important work of Beethoven's, of which the total impression, as it haunts us after we have heard it, could be called "sombre." There is the Funeral March, to be sure, in the Eroica; but even that has holy joy and triumph in it. Hence it is possible to do, what has been done repeatedly, what can hardly be done with any other composer, make up a programme wholly of his music without the slightest danger of fatiguing sameness. This was a concert in honor of BEETHOVEN, as not only the programme, but the noble offering (from a devoted lady who felt the spirit of the occasion) of the floral crown suspended over Crawford's statue, testified. It was the opening of a whole series of concerts so arranged as to pivot on the recognition of the Centennial Year of the great master as a central point. Indeed it could be called, in the cheerfuller sense of the word, a musical solemnity, implying dignity and grandeur, which surely are not necessarily sombre. What could be fitly coupled with the noble works already named? Certainly nothing trivial and light; nothing popular and hacknied; none of the "Future" novelties; none of the brilliant "effect" pieces; that would have spoiled the picture, made an incongruous medley of it. Bach in the greatest company is evermore in place. In the limited repertoire of vocal solos offered by Beethoven, and in the hope of realizing here some day that too long postponed performance of the Passion Music, what could be better, for one thing, than to give the audience a first hearing of that beautiful and noble Aria for a bass voice? Nor was the trust reposed thus in the true perception, taste and feeling of the audience thrown away. Sung as it was, in a good honest, simple way, with true nobility of style, by Mr. WHITNEY, although it might have had more depth and fineness of expression, it seemed to win the warmest general welcome, and will be eagerly asked for again whenever practicable. Verily it is a new sign and a hopeful, when all the critics of the daily papers go into rhapsodies about a work by Bach, as they did on that next morning. Only they seem (some of them) to have mistaken the intention of the song. It is not to be supposed the song of Judas penitent, the outpouring of his remorse and bitter agony, and of his yearning to return to the "dear Master" whom he had betrayed. The words may have misled some into the idea; hence here again the "sombreness" was all imaginary. But such is not the dominant expression of the music. It is a song addressed (not in the mouth of any individual character, but rather of the Christian Church personified, according to the whole plan of the Poem) to the chief priests, not only pleading for the surrender of the betrayed one, but upbraiding them for his detention after the betrayer, himself has flung the wages of his treason at their feet and gone and hanged himself, hinting of the fate of Judas as a warning to themselves. Hence it is not at all a minor strain; the music waxes bold and confident as it goes on, albeit it is tempered with that tender, deep affection for the Master which inspires the Passion Music at whatever page you open. The composition surely is most beautiful and noble, both in the melody and orchestral accompaniment, which Bach left only written out for the quartet of strings, together with the figurative violin solo (finely played by Mr. LISTEMANN and which Robert Franz has filled out in the very spirit of the master by the addition of a pair of clarinets and of bassoons. Still more rehearsal would have given more of sympathetic fineness to the orchestral part, although it went not badly.

It only remains to speak of the Prelude to the third act of Cherubini's "Medea," which, for a short introduction to the Second Part, was music grand enough to go with Beethoven, and even stirring the imagination with something of the appalling power of the great introduction to the prison scene of "Fidelio." This, we admit, is "sombre" music; but it is also very thrilling and exciting, producing with quite simple means what a sublime effect! How impressive those deep unisons and those mighty, almost terrible crescendos! And most effectively did Mr. ZERRAHN wield his orchestral forces in producing them so palpably.

From the first to the last note of the concert, the attention of the whole audience was complete and earnest,—one of the best tokens of success artistically. The general impression, we believe, was that the various changes in the material of the orchestra, together with increased care in rehearsal, had brought about a manifest improvement, at least a better unity of tone and spirit. With each successive concert, the zealous conductor will have them still more perfectly in hand.

The Public Rehearsals thus far excite considerable interest, but the attendance must be still much larger, as we have little doubt it will be, to make them any 'benefit' to the musicians.

In this week's programme [the second], with its Haydn Symphony, first "Leonore" Overture, Post-Overture by Rietz, and Solos for the Violin, there is nothing "heavy," unless it be the Lisztian "Preludes." As we go to press on Thursday, we can only notice it next time.

The Third Concert, Dec. 1, offers the second Overture to "Leonore" (first time); the Aria and Gavotte from the Bach Suite in D; Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony; Cherubini's Overture to "Fanciulla" [new]; Schubert's Fantasia, op. 16, as arranged for piano and orchestra by Liszt [which Mr. Lane will play]; and the Overture to "Euryanthe."—A fortnight later comes the central one of the three Beethoven Concerts, two days before the centennial birthday;—this by way of prelude to a "Choral Symphony" concert to be given jointly in the name of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Harvard Musical Association, probably on Saturday the 17th, which is the actual birthday.

CHAMBER CONCERTS. We have barely room to gather up a few of the most interesting. And here we are reminded of the loss we suffer in the disappearance of the old haunt of such music, Chickering Hall.

Mr. PERAZO took for his first Friday Matinée [Oct. 28] the smaller Horticultural Hall,—a place in which, musically, we could not feel quite at home. There was a goodly audience, however, of the right kind; the music sounded well, and the occasion was successful. He played the Beethoven Sonata in E flat (first of the two in op. 27), Fantasia-like in form, and very beautiful. He played it tenderly and with poetic feeling in the more delicate parts, and with great force and fire in the finale. Then two pleasing little pieces by Bargiel; and finally the great Fantasia in C, op. 15, by Schubert, in the original form, [we are to have it with orchestra.] This was done superbly; the broad harmony where the "Wanderer" theme comes in, and the strong fugato movement at the end especially. Mr. KRISSEMAN, for whom indulgence was asked on the score of illness, nevertheless sang with true artistic style and feeling one of the most beautiful Tenor Recitatives and Arias from Bach's Passion Music: "Geduld, Geduld!" which points to the suffering Savior as a divine example of patience. Nothing more difficult in the whole Passion music could have been selected, and we doubt if in the country we could find another singer competent to undertake it. It made a deep impression. The three Frans songs, especially "Die Harrende" and the impassioned "Er ist gekommen," were most warmly received.

For the second Concert Mr. Perabo took us to the upper hall, which had a much more genial aspect. He began, for a novelty, with a Pastoral Sonata, op. 47, by Carl Ljéw, the famous ballet writer, who died a year ago. It is called "Le Printemps" [the Spring], and its four movements represent: a) Dawn of Day [full of bird twitterings], and morning worship, Allegro; b) Broad Day [Allegretto]; c) "Vie champêtre" [Scherzo]; d) Evening Twilight, followed by Allegro aerial. It is a graceful, cheerful, rather common-place "all-Viennese" composition, without marked individuality, but pleasant enough to hear for once. The three "Musical Sketches" by Sarnadale Bennett: "The Lake," "The Mill-stream," "The Fountain" were very charming, characteristic, genial little pieces, well contrasted and original. The other Sonata of Beethoven's Op. 27, the well known "Moonlight," was most welcome for the closing piece. The singing was by Mrs. BARRY, who with admirable voice and feeling sang the "Cradle Song" from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, and three Songs by Robert Frans.

In the third Matinée (Nov. 25), Mr. Perabo will play Beethoven's Sonata, op. 31, No. 1, a theme with Variations from Schubert's D-minor Quartet; and four Songs, transcribed by Reinecke, from Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin."—these last in place of the Bach Aria which Mr. Whitney was to sing.

A choice and charming programme was that of the Soirée, given by the teachers of the Boston Conservatory [Wednesday eve, Nov. 3] in the lower hall of Tremont Temple. In spite of the almost suffocating heat of the crowded cavernous place, the music was listened to with closest interest to the end. Two admirably contrasted Trios for piano, violin and 'cello: the great one in E flat by Schubert, and a fresh, delightful one by Haydn, in D major, No. 6, a model in its way, opened and closed the feast. Both were played in a masterly manner by Messrs. LEONARD, KICHBERG and ILKIND. Mme. JOHANNSEN, of "Fidelio" memory, true artist as she is, although some portions of her voice are grown a little hard, can still command tones sweet and musical and strong, and many a grace of style. She sang Schubert's "Barcarolle" charmingly, and, with Signor ARPAVANI, Mozart's "La ci darem." Mr. H. WILDS made a decidedly good impression with one of the Arias from Handel's operas, arranged by Frans; as he did also with another of them in a former concert, the audience not being satisfied without a repetition of it. These were Alto Arias sung with a Bass voice.

Christine Nilsson.

And now we come to the "musical event" of the day,—to the arrival and the triumph of the far famed, the eagerly awaited, the already, for sometime at least, established Queen of hearts, if not of Song, even in this "cold critical Athens," as silly folk elsewhere are wont to call it,—to the beautiful and fair young Swede, CHRISTINA NILSSON.

First, a word about the Nilsson Concerts, as such, and the musical material and personnel which Manager Max Strakosch has brought to us. Our readers know our dislike, as a rule, for Miscellaneous Concerts, in which, without artistic unity, "attractions" are huddled together in wearisome profusion in one programme, while music itself is humbled to the condition of mere tiring maid or valet for the dressing out and exhibition of My Lady or My Lord, the singing or performing person. Our musical public, too, are getting to have right notions in this matter, and sincerely to prefer the pure artistic occasion, even without "stars," to any sort of medley with stars. What we had read, therefore, of Mr. Strakosch's programmes in New York, did not prepossess us with a very strong desire to hear them. How far can the radiance of "one bright particular star" go, the mere hearing of one however real and resistless singer under such conditions,—playing central figure in a crowded, clumsy frame,—to reconcile us to a melange of common-place things from Italian Operas, by a superfluity of stars of lesser magnitude; her own selections, even, being hacknied arias by Verdi or Donizetti, modern French things, a few well-worn ballads, and the like? We felt this objection to the first programme here in Boston. But after hearing we must own that, for concerts of this kind, they are on the whole pretty well made up, while the selection of artists is particularly rich and choice.

In the first place we must commend a certain thoroughness with which all is done; the mere fact of an orchestra in all the Concerts,—a rather small one to be sure, and rough and boisterous too often,—under the experienced conductorship of MARETZEK, to open the bill with popular overtures like "Zampa," "Martha," "Masaniello," "Tell," "Fra Diavolo," close it with Wedding March, or march from Le Prophète (to which by the way, nobody listened,—one of the marks by which you know a virtuoso concert from an artistic one), as well as to accompany the solos. And here let us add this special praise: that every piece has been given with its full orchestral accompaniment where that existed, leaving only ballads and minor encore pieces to the pianist, Sig. BOSOXI, who has shown himself a good accompanist.

What can we say enough in recognition of so rare and high an artistic presence, as that of HENRI VIEUXTEMPS, one of the world's really great violinists? A matter, sound and ripe, in every sense of the word. Sure and perfect in whatever he undertakes. That he was when he first came here twenty-five years ago, when he had finer triumph with the few than Ole Bull had with the many; and again, thirteen years ago. But then we thought the very perfection of his playing a little dry and uninspired. Now he looks older, but plays younger, i. e. with more fire and out of a deeper feeling, than before. One could listen to his pure tones, his exquisite phrasing, and watch his graceful bowing all night long. His later compositions, too, display more character and power. That "Fantaisie Appassionata" is indeed a very impressive work, dramatic, and full of interesting ideas, which he always knows how to work up like an artist, for the orchestra as well. Almost as much may be said of the "Andante and Rondo," not to mention more familiar pieces. The Romanza, with piano, for an encore piece, is full of true and tender feeling; while, in the frolic vein, his fantasy on "St. Patrick's Day," is full of comic humor, and completely Irish. Nightly the veteran is recalled. What greater compliment could he have had, what better proof of an appreciative public, than on that first night, when, after the Overture, and the Duet by the two men, the vast crowd, all impatient for the Nilsson, not only listened with delight to his long and clever fantasia on Gounod's Faust, some twenty minutes, but even then insisted on his playing something more!

Miss ANNIE CARY, the Yankee girl, who left us four years since with the large, rich contralto voice, comes back an artist,—a genuine, good, honest singer, not perhaps of the inspired kind, but still a singer whom it is a joy to hear. And she is handsome, hearty, natural as ever; evidently well-taught, with none of the modern vocal affectations. She has proved her quality in a pretty wide range, having sung from Semiramide, the page's song in the Huguenots, Ah! mon fils, ballads, duets, &c.

Sig. BRIGANDI is in good condition, and has done his part well upon the whole. VERGER has a good baritone, which he knows how to use, and has won recognition for the simple, modest, conscientious manner in which he has borne his part. It was really a pleasure to hear the Barber's "Largo al factotum" sung with vivacity and yet in so genteel a way.

And now for the central figure. It was indeed a privilege not to be called upon for an opinion after the first night. Nor are we eager even now after six concerts, to risk the declaration of a full opinion. To weigh so individual and fresh a creature in the scale of "criticism" were but not undertaken rashly; nor are we sure that we possess the fittest scales wherewith to weigh her. At the outset we renounce comparison. What is it whether NILSSON be as great as Jenny Lind, or Sontag, Bosio, and the other great ones? If there is one thing certain about her, it is that she is original, and must be judged of by herself. No matter how you may compare with others, no matter how carefully you catalogue the qualities of a fine voice, the orthodox requirements of a singer, and say she has not or she has all these (and just all this is said of every great singer), you have defined nothing if you leave out her. Her individuality, so Northern in its type, yet so unique, peculiarly her own, is the great secret of her charm. It took time and acquaintance to perceive this; it will take we know not how much more to read it fully. Of most prime donne one knows all in a short time; you can still hear with pleasure, but you expect nothing new. In this young Swede you always are prepared for something new. It is a new kind of a nature, a fresh revelation of the genius and the genius human. It charms you at the very first, but perhaps also disappoints you. We, for one, went home from the first concert somewhat puzzled, also somehow strangely spell-bound. Next to the grace and beauty of the apparition, the sweet winning smile, and frank cordial manner, your attention is caught by strange little ways and actions, seemingly wilful and coquettish, with which she keeps you waiting for her song. Then she begins: the well-known Aria from Handel's Tesidora: "Angels ever bright and fair." We thought she sang this, or at least began it, under some constraint, as if not quite at home with a new audience. We thought too that her singing of it seemed a little overstudied, as if she would make too much of the simple, noble melody. But there was no denying the sincere pathos of expression. It had a virginal, religious purity. One might doubt for a while whether so much delicacy of sotto voce, so much prolonging of a tone in pianissimo, were not conscious arts rather than real feeling, and whether all those tears stole into the voice unbidden; but we soon were too glad to dismiss such whispers from our mind.

The voice, as we felt partly then, as we know better now, is one of exceeding purity and beauty, not so uniformly large and great as some, but sympathetic and transparent, as it were, to such a degree that it hides itself in the expression of the song, and so eludes you as a palpable substance by itself. Her own nature, too, is so sympathetic, so dramatic in the true sense, so full of genius, that she transforms herself into her song, whatever it may be, the instant she begins to sing; and so she instantly arrests the full attention of her audience and holds it to the end. In the florid scena from Lucia she showed how her voice could revel in all the intricacies of such Italian bravura, and in the Cavatina from La Traviata she carried her audience away completely. For encores she gave a quaint old Swedish (Dalecarlian) dance tune, worked up into a witching little "Ball" scene, of changeable humor; and the homely "Minstrel" ballad of "Old Folks at Home," twice over, for the simple pathos of this was quite irresistible. Ballads by most singers make us squirm, but this was beautiful, one of Art's transfigurations. Yet has it not been given quite as many times as it will bear?

The triumph, with the many, was complete. And for the secret of it? Beauty of person, beauty of voice, the Northern nature, the rare individuality, the spell of genius still reserving far more than it shows. The voice is Northern, like herself; white (so to say) and colorless, till some emotion color it. A voice from the mountains, pure and spiritual; not sensuous and full of Southern warmth and color, as a permanent condition, but quickly flushed with color, in the play of feelings, like her own lustrous pale complexion. The harmony between her nature and her voice are perfect; voice and look and smile are one, so that you can scarce separate them; in tender, graceful passages the voice itself smiles. Moreover, she is something of a witch, an airy, tricky Northern sprite, a sort of being one might love, admire, and yet feel a certain fear of, as of a mermaid. Even that first night one carried away the impression that there was something weird and eerie, something a little preterhuman about it; the imaginative brain of the young peasant girl, who sang her songs and played her violin at village fairs, was surely cradled amid Northern Lights. There is always something unexpected to come from her. Yet how womanly, how truly human! This Undine has a soul.

Two more remarks only now, for our space is gone. First, it is vastly in favor of the singer, that her capacities of voice are not in haste to make themselves all known at all times. The mad scene of Ophelia, the second night, revealed dramatic qualities you had not known before; the recitative from Mozart's Tito and the air still more, and only in one of the last concerts, when she gave out "Let the bright Seraphim" in such great, thrilling, penetrating, splendid tones, had most of her audience suspected that power in her. It is a great artist that can keep such powers back so long.—Secondly, in her most tragic and impassioned passages, some suspect her, because she can so readily and instantly throw off the part and seem to play with those about her. This is a faculty of all great actors, actors of genius we mean; they can both feel their part and be embodied in it, and at the same time stand outside of it. This is the difference between actual life and true imagination.—Finally, to say all in a word, Christine Nilsson is a real singer, one who sings and does not merely vocalize.—Of the other concerts next time.

Reminiscences of Nilsson.

To the Editor of the Boston Times:

The story of Nilsson's studies in Paris has been already told; but the chroniclers have failed to do justice to a lady, who, for three years, devoted her energy, ability,—in fact her entire self,—to the early education of the celebrated singer. In Batignolles, a suburb of Paris, on a retired street, is a white house with a prim exterior, which seemed to have had an influence on the street, for it always appeared to be enjoying a struggle with dirt, which its neighbors for some reason, never attempted. In this prim house the reader would have discovered a matronly lady—a true specimen of the thoroughbred English gentilewoman, by name Mme. Collinet. She was in charge of a school—one of those select establishments where the first daughters of England received what is commonly termed a "finished education." It was there that the final polish had been delivered to the dull brain of many a fair scholar.

In 1861, Mlle. Nilsson became an élève there. Her spirituelle character, her artless and happy winning disposition, which cannot now be suppressed upon the stage, won for her the affection of her playmates and the love of her mistress, Mme. Collinet,—whose acts of kindness and charity are recorded in the hearts of many in Paris, as you may say,—adopted Christine, and she labored for her success with extraordinary love and fidelity. Soirées were given at the school during the winter months, and Mme. Collinet's soon became a rendezvous of the musically cultivated Parisians. There was no jealousy of Nilsson among her companions; on the contrary, they all seemed to struggle as to which should sing her praises the loudest. Full of fun, the "Swedish songstresses" then was at the head of every frolic that was originated at the school.

It was during one of these soirées that the writer first made the acquaintance of the cantatrice. She was leading a skirmishing party of her fun-loving companions, their laughter and wholesome enjoyments pervaded the room, when Mlle. Collinet called her from her spirits, and with a face all flushed with pleasure she hastily came bounding across the room in answer to the call. There was a grace, a self-possession so extremely artless exhibited then, which has since been the remark of thousands. During the evening Mlle. Nilsson appeared en costume de bal masqué, and she gave some morceaux from Traviata with marvellous effect. Her debut was approaching. Her vocal teacher was present, and I kept my eyes alternately on him and his pupil. In fact it was difficult to separate one from the other, as there seemed to exist so much sympathy between them.

Over six years have gone by; time in union with wilful fortune has separated the writer from the cantatrice. It was therefore with some feelings of distrust that, having learned the hour Mademoiselle Nilsson received, he handed his card to her valet. After waiting some time he was invited to mount the staircase of the Revere House leading to her apartments. Two minutes more and Nilsson, the great singer, was before him. It was a warm reception to tender so humble an individual as myself. Where was the dignity, cold and formal, which I had anticipated? The six years had simply played with the child of fortune. There was the same mellow ring to her laugh, the same laughing dimples to her smile, and the generous impulse of her nature still existed. How earnestly she reviewed our acquaintance abroad, her career since then, and interested herself in her more unfortunate brother.

Referring to her visit to America, Mlle. Nilsson expressed herself highly delighted with it. From her having arrived in New York, she considered that her "home" on the continent. It was there she had landed, and from there she should depart. It was with some feelings of anxiety that she had come to Boston. She had been told that the Bostonians were a hard set of people to move to enthusiasm, and that their froidueur was the hardest of criticism to bear. She had dreaded such a reception. She could stand the most searching criticisms, but a stolid indifference, she was afraid, would be insufferably tormentable—(sic.)

The generous nature of the cantatrice, her anxiety to please her audiences, in short her whole nature would be against such a reception. The Boston audience to which she was presented on Friday, the 4th of November, was enthusiasm itself, and she is of the opinion that her reception in Boston was better, when the character of her audience is considered, than what she had met with elsewhere. She is enthusiastic in the praises of the Boston people, and firmly asserts her preference for Boston and its characteristics.

Her terror of the east winds was rather amusing. Their powers of evil had evidently been greatly exaggerated to her, for she seemed to regard them with the same terror that a boy regards hobgoblins, etc. At her concert on Monday evening, November 7th, in an encore of "Concours le pays," she sang "J'ai revé de toi, Clara Collinet," a song which called forth much applause. It was to her old friend, Mme. Collinet of Batignolles, that she had sung, and the act itself does much towards asserting her affection and appreciation of her old mistress.

Thus, when thousands are singing the praises of the cantatrice, it would seem a fitting opportunity to record against the name of Mme. Collinet all the credit which to her belongs for her careful rearing of her scholar. Six years ago Nilsson made her debut in the Theatre Lyrique of Paris. It was from Mme. Collinet's school in Batignolles that she went there, and her heart now seems overflowing with gratitude to a faithful and disinterested lady who labored for her as for a child. "Honi soit qui mal y pense,"

Nilsson at the Swedish Lutheran Church at North Bridgewater.

There is at the present time no Swedish Church in New England. At Mrs. Drake's Hall, Campello, near Bridgewater, a small gathering of the Northmen has been held every Sunday. The society—if the gathering may be so termed—was composed of Swedes who were engaged in the shoe factories of North Bridgewater. About thirty-five of the faithful have been thus accustomed to meet. Early in December, 1869, the Rev. Henry Lindeblad, then of Henry, Illinois, started for the East for a three months' sojourn on missionary efforts. He visited the hall in Campello, and by his efforts the small assemblage of thirty-five increased to eighty. The society has been in existence since 1867, but until his visit it never assumed any importance. * * *

A few days ago, Messrs. H. Lindeblad and C. G. Lagergren, a delegation appointed by the society to visit Nilsson, called upon her, and they obtained through her influence the permission of Mr. Straknash to allow her to sing in a concert in aid of the society of her countrymen. Last evening that concert took place. At half past four Mlle. Nilsson, in the company of Mr. Jarrett, her manager, and of Colonel W. W. Berg and other prominent Swedes, left the Old Colony depot by special train for North Bridgewater, where the concert in aid of the Swedish Church had been arranged to take place at the Universalist Church of the Disciples (Rev. J. M. Atwood). On arriving at the town, shortly after five o'clock, the depot was found to be in the hands of an eager and curious crowd, not by any means distinguishable for its good behavior. Miss Annie L. Cary left the car the first, and the crowd at once supposed she was Mlle. Nilsson. They accordingly escorted her to a hack, crowded round her and tendered her the importunities which they had specially reserved for Mlle. Nilsson. At last the church was reached, and to a crowded house representing twenty-five hundred dollars the following programme was given:—

1. Trio—"Messe Solennelle.".....Bozzini
Mlle. Cary, Signor Brignoli and Signor Verger.
2. Ave Maria.....Gounod.
Mlle. Nilsson.
With Violin Obligato, by Mons. Vieuxtemps.
3. Romance.....Donizetti.
Signor Brignoli.
4. Aria—"Ah, mon Fil.".....Meyerbeer.
Mlle. Cary.
5. Reverie—Violin.....Vieuxtemps.
Mons. Vieuxtemps.
6. Cantique—"Le Rameau".....Faure.
Signor Verger.
7. Swedish Melodies.....Mlle. Nilsson.

Mlle. Nilsson was received with great enthusiasm. Her rendering of Gounod's "Ave Maria" was encored, and she treated the audience to the familiar and pathetic "Home, Sweet Home." Brignoli's performance was much applauded, and he was compelled to respond to the encore. Mlle. Cary in like manner was favored, and Monsieur Vieuxtemps had to treat them to the "Arkansas Traveller," in response to the loud calls. Mr. Verger has never done better than he did at this concert. His solo was adapted to his voice, and the church was also within its power. Mlle. Nilsson gave her "Swedish Melodies" charmingly. Her countrymen, a large number of whom were in the audience, seemed perfectly carried away by her talent, and when in a second response she sang the "Old Folks at Home," and when her own emotion seemed to threaten a break-down, it is difficult to describe the feeling which seemed to have taken possession of the audience. She was recalled amid storms of applause.

On leaving the church, in the vestry a number of her countrymen had gathered, and a song of praise was given by the congregation of the Swedish Lutheran church of Bethesda, Mlle. Nilsson singing with the rest. At the depot another crowd had assembled, and Mlle. Nilsson showed herself at the windows, and amid the cheers of the people the party left.

COUNTING THE COST.—The Weekly Season (Philadelphia), gives the following estimate of the cost of taking a young lady to hear Mlle. Nilsson:

To two tickets.....	$8 00
Carriage.....	6 00
One pair of kids.....	2 50
One neck-tie.....	1 25
One bouquet.....	50
Concert-book.....	25
Supper.....	5 00
Papers next morning [to see whether it was a good concert].....	18
Feeling a man at intermission.....	50
Best of Nilsson, which J. Maria would buy before she heard her.....	5 00
Total.....	$29 18

N. B.—The young man's weekly board is only $12 50, and his salary $23.

An Autumn Hymn.

BY T. W. PARSONS.

Should autumn's golden days depart
And never leave behind
A lesson to the grateful heart—
A harvest for the mind?

For autumn and his golden days,
For all his goodly things,
We'll sing a cheerful song of praise,
For all that autumn brings.

Dear God! who gav'st the kindly rain
On summer's dronth to fall,
The sun and rain made strong the grain;
But autumn ripened all.

For autumn's glad and golden days,
For all his blessed things,
We'll sing a cheerful song of praise,
For all that autumn brings.

Though autumn's suns more coldly shine,
Earth's glory is not lost;
Night bears the Pleiads' radiant sign;
Morn shows the silver frost.

And though his fields be bare and brown,
Old autumn's praise we'll sing;
October's gold shall be her crown,
And autumn shall be king!

The Four "Fidelio" Overtures.

[From the London Athenæum, Nov. 5].

The fact that Beethoven composed four overtures to the only opera which has emanated from his fertile brain, is evidence of the deep interest he must have taken in the story of "Fidelio." The subject was precisely that which best suited his character and disposition; for, morose and rough as he was to strangers, he was a man of acute sensibility and had a kind heart. There is no more touching tale than that which is found in the libretto of "Fidelio." The wife who, disguised in male attire, seeks a long-lost husband, confined in a prison at the fiat of a ruthless persecutor, is placed in situations of such a nature that even audiences long familiar with the dénouement of the plot are always excited beyond measure in the dungeon scene, where Leonora saves the life of Florestan. The intrinsic interest of the incidents is overwhelming, and the composer was inspired to that degree, that not only has he bequeathed a masterpiece to the musical world in the opera per se, but he has left four preludes; which, whether executed in the theatre or the concert-room, are so sensational in effect, from the grandeur of the treatment, that more than one of them may be looked upon rather in the light of a symphony than of an overture. It is not only in the fecundity of the ideas, so rich in melodious imagery, that these four works are remarkable, but it is in the alternations of pathos and power that tells so forcibly on hearers, whether performed singly or in succession. It was feared that to place the four "Fidelio" overtures in one programme might pall on the ear; but so diversified are the themes, and so varied is the treatment, that each composition has its speciality, its peculiar attributes, and its absorbing interest. And yet, it requires no unnatural stretch of the imagination to connect the orchestration of each prelude with the story; there are ever and anon some bars suggesting points of the domestic tale. In two of the overtures there is the sublime trumpet part, the thrilling effect of which is so irresistible. It must be an odd fancy to associate these trumpet sounds, announcing the arrival of the superior authority destined to punish Don Pizarro, with battle scenes. Beethoven knew what he was about when he wrote this electrical motivo for the trumpet. With the chorus of prisoners, associations may have passed in his mind, stern republican as he was, of political persecution, of the sighs and tears of persecuted patriots; but how powerfully does this fine chorus predispose an auditory to sympathize with Florestan and his brave wife! The history of these four overtures and an analysis thereof would exact the space and proportion of an elaborate essay. Without going into the vexed question whether Beethoven was provoked into writing four introductions to the opera by a conclave of presumptuous critics, or by the intricacies of his instrumentation, which so taxed the players of the day, there is ample reason to be grateful that the works exist: but which one ought to be selected when the opera is performed is the knotty point. Sir Michael Costa, when "Fidelio" was first produced at the Royal Italian Opera, chose the one in E, now generally played abroad, as well as at home, and between the acts he gave No. 3, in C, Op. 72 b. Now as this latter work is the most complex, brilliant and effective of the four preludes, there is the natural objection that it fenders the remainder of the opera flat. In fact, the Nos. 2 and 3 in C, both having the trumpet passage, are too massive and exciting for the calm enjoyment of the operatic story. For No. 1, which is also in C, and which is marked Op. 138, although Beethoven's first Overture to "Fidelio," which was discarded, there are strong partisans, for it contains one of the most lovely melodies ever heard, and the story is treated in a masterly manner. Mendelssohn conducted No. 1 at the Philharmonic Society in 1844, the first time it was performed in this country. Berlioz had a keen relish for this same No. 1, for he introduced it at Exeter Hall Orchestral Concerts of 1852, and subsequently at Drury Lane Theatre, where the opera was given. Here were two eminent musicians who could scarcely agree, although good friends, in things musical, who were at all events of one mind as to Beethoven's first "Fidelio" overture, declined by the clique at Vienna on the ground that it did not sufficiently foreshadow the action of the opera. The execution by the Crystal Palace Band of these four overtures created a perfect "furore," and the conductor and players received quite an exceptional ovation. It was an event for the Sydenham musical managers, and the experiment will bear repetition even in a non-Beethoven celebration. To add that the C minor Symphony (No. 5, Op. 67) was included in the scheme, will account for the indifference with which the vocal pieces were regarded, even if there had been good singing, which there was not, certainly; it was a Day with Beethoven.

Michael Balfe.

[From the Athenæum, Nov. 5].

At the age of sixty-three,—little older than was Gluck when he gained the first of those five triumphs which still hold Europe,—this agreeable and facile melodist, whose works for some thirty years ran through England, France, and even Germany, died a few days ago, after a brief illness. In Balfe's case, "the charm" had been "wound up" for a considerable period past; his fame had almost wholly died out; and whereas the theatrical songs of Arne, Bishop, Shield, are still recurred to by English singers when they wish to escape from the ballad "of the period," his music may be said already to have passed out of hearing and sympathy.

Balfe was born in Dublin on the 15th of May, 1803, richly endowed with that spontaneous genius, the presence of which has so peculiarly marked the musicians and melodists of Ireland—from the days of its harpers to our own. He received his first musical instruction, we are told, from a Wexford bandmaster, subsequently from that sweet and original melodist, Charles Horn, and from his father. His studies appear to have been miscellaneous, and what may be called roving, rather than special or complete. He became early remarked as the possessor of a tuneable voice, and is said to have sung as a boy in concerts and oratorios. Like his countryman, Vincent Wallace, he was a fair violin-player; and, as such, ventured to present himself to the public in one of Viotti's Concertos. There is no trace of his having ever betaken himself seriously to learning counterpoint or harmony; and the want of solidity in this necessary structural basis of all music that is to last,—no matter whether it be gay or grave,—no matter whether the fancy be ever so affluent, was one of the many obvious qualities which contribute to make perishable his popularity. It began, however, from almost the first moment when he put pen to paper. Perhaps the first of Balfe's many ballads printed was the pretty tune to "The Lover's Mistake,"—an arch song, in the "Songs to Rosa," by Haynes Bayly. The composer and the lyricist, both made for better things, had many qualities in common: to be summed up in one word, for which we have no English equivalent—nonchalance. Haynes Bayly, during his reign, almost thrust Moore from his throne; Balfe, as will be seen, had such chances as no opera-composer of the century, or indeed of any time, enjoyed before or beside him. But the song-writer and the musician are, like the companions of the Last Rose of Summer, "faded and gone."

In the year 1824 (to quote a contemporary, "Men of the Time") Balfe appeared at Drury Lane Theatre in "Der Freischütz." In the year 1825 he went to Rome—in 1826 he wrote for La Scala the music to a ballet, "Perouse"; and later in the same year, Signor Balfe sang, at the Italian Opera in Paris, as Figaro in "Il Barbiere." The success did not justify the temerity of his attempt: for those were the glorious days when there were such artists abroad as Sontag, Malibran, Davide, Galli, and Lablache. Balfe returned into Italy; in the year 1830 he was singing at Piacenza; he went down into Sicily—again tried the stage at Palermo,—and there gave his first opera, "I Rivali." During five subsequent years he was singing and composing in Florence, Milan and Venice; flinging out carelessly sundry operas of no worth or value,—among which his "Enrico Quarto al passo della Marna" is the only work worth naming, as having been written for the prima donna, Mlle. Lina Roser,—whom he married. During Balfe's Italian career he was not prevented by modesty from interpolating music of his own into the operas of Rossini, Donizetti, and the critical and suspicious Meyerbeer. It is stated by M. Fétis, that the indignation against such malpractices ventured in regard to "Il Crociato" was the deciding cause which drove him back to England.

From the year 1835, when his "Siege of Rochelle" was produced at Drury Lane, on the same libretto as Ricci's "Chiara di Rosenberg," with a dashing success, the career of Balfe was one, during many years, of unexampled popularity. If ever theatrical musician had the ball at his foot, he was the man. The immediate and brilliant success of his first venture on the English stage for a time led, if not to entire monopoly in his favor, to comparative discouragement of every other composer. The whole state of affairs and system of writing was thereby made false and rotten. The paltry ballad,—to be sung by Mr. Phillips, or Mr. Templeton, or Mr. Harrison, in which words such as wiser men than Lord Dundreary might fail to understand were set, and to be poked in, no matter what the passion of the scene,—no matter what the suspense of the situation, was accepted in full in place of an entire dramatic work; and the ridiculous practice was not merely driven to excess, by singers, managers and publishers, in the case of one author, but led to corresponding concessions and follies, on the part of even such better men as M. Benedict and Mr. John Barnett (whose "Farinelli" ought not to be forgotten), not to speak of Mr. Rooke and Mr. Wallace. Betwixt the short-sighted folly and the enormous gains of Balfe and Bunn and the publishers, and the growing indifference of a public satiated by vulgarity and false effects, in proportion as its intelligence increased, the chances of establishing a real national Opera were adjourned—perhaps, to the "Ides of March."

In pursuance of the above argument and statement, which may seem severe to all who accept the popular fallacy "De mortuis," in easy forgetfulness of the extent to which the dead by their malpractices as by their virtues may influence the living who succeed them, the list of Balfe's best operas may be run through. Next, in England, after "The Siege of Rochelle," came "The Maid of Artois,"—a setting of the story of "Manon Lescaut," provided for an artist no less superb than Mme. Malibran, who saved the trashy work by her seizing an odd waltz-tune for its final rondo, and, by her mastery over its oddities, converting them into so many vocal triumphs. Subsequently came for England (I do not vouch for their chronological order) "Catherine Gray," in which there is a charming final rondo; "The Daughter of St. Mark," on the same book as Halévy's "Reine de Chypre" (the first finale of which, vulgarized as it is by Mr. Harrison's intrepid resolution to enjoy his ballad and its encore, contains one of Balfe's best concerted pieces); "Joan of Arc," "The Enchantress," "The Bondman," "Diadeste," "The Maid of Honor," "Keolanthe" (written to produce Mme. Balfe upon the stage, and in which the French style was not unsuccessfully assumed), "The Bondman," "The Rose of Castille," with its stupendous laughing trio—

He's not a queen, Ha! Ha!
She's not a boy, Ha! Ha!

and "Satanella" (these two written for Miss Louisa Pyne), "The Enchantress," "The Maid of Honor," and "Bianca." As time went on, the success of the series gradually palled and paled, and the satiety and the waning were, of course, ascribed to national ignorance. Where was the good of "casting pearls" before homely animals? (not to speak disparagingly). But the pearls cast by Balfe in other places fared rather worse than better than these enumerated. No composer of any country, or at any time, has been commissioned more genially and generously, or supported more magnificently than he. To enumerate a few of his foreign chances:—he had to write for the Grand Opera of Paris, and filiped off "L'Etoile de Seville" as jauntily as though it had been so much Vaudeville work. That miserable production naturally died, and made no sign. He had got a hearing at the Opera Comique of the French capital: but his "Puits d'Amour," though supported by Mme. Thillon, then in the hey-day of her prettiness and popularity, fared little better. The "Quatre Fils d'Aymon," Balfe's second commission from the Opera Comique, had another fate. In Paris it failed to establish itself. In Germany its rollicking spirit and the novelty contained in it,—a group of four women contrasted against one of four men (subsequently again attempted by M. A. Thomas in his "Cour de Célimène"),—won it a lively and wide circulation. Then, for our London Italian Opera, Balfe had another amazing chance, in his "Falstaff," written on commission for only Grisi and Mme. Albertazzi, Falstaff Lablache, Rubini and Tamburini, in the year 1838, when that company of artists was in its prime. "What would you?" as Mrs. Quickly said (according to Goldsmith): even with such a brilliant opportunity as this, even when supported by the press, and petted by the nobility, he allowed the ground to slip from beneath his feet. A single terzetto, "Voglio parlar dell'ira," with its whimsical effect of female unisons at the close, is the only piece to be remembered.

To speak of Balfe as an artist is either to misuse the word, or to permit its meaning to depend on temporary success, no matter how acquired. He was indifferent to the quality of the stories he treated, to the words he set, to the situations he outraged; content if the clap-trap honors of the gallery and the shop-counter were secured. And these, during many years, fell to his lot "with a vengeance." Had it been otherwise, he could never have remained, for a season, in association with such a literary comrade as Mr. Bunn, whose

Hollow hearts that wear a mask,

(only one out of a thousand similar flowers of sense and speech,) was embalmed by Punch, with a pungency which almost might be said to keep the flower of rhetoric alive. But sense or nonsense were alike welcome to the careless musician, as is to be heard in his setting of his countryman Moore's song.

They tell me thou'rt—the favored guest:

where the stress on the words italicized and the break in the line produce an effect only one degree less absurd than the never-to-be forgotten punctuation of the Laureate's

Queen of the Rosebud,—Garden of Girls.

The same recklessness is to be regretted in every part of Balfe's work. He was not without some taste for curiosities of instrumentation and harmony, but he flung these about with a want of care and disregard of crudity, the result of which was to render him often tasteless, harsh and unmeaning, when he may have fancied himself ingenious and original. In brief, there was no stamen in any of his productions, on whatsoever side they be considered, and therefore they have perished, while the best of the operas by men apparently, but not essentially, as slight as himself (to name but two, Adolphe Adam and Bellini) still keep the stage. Enough, for the moment, concerning one whose triumph during a short period was so justly succeeded by a downfall admitting small hope of recovery in the future:—enough, but not too much. The story cannot be too clearly told,—the moral not too forcibly emphasized for the instruction of musicians to come.

H. F. CHORLEY.

Against the above the Orchestra puts in the following protest:

One of the most unfriendly and unfair biographies we have seen is the mortuary notice of Balfe by Mr. Chorley. Even if it were possible to agree with Mr. Chorley's estimate of the dead composer, the propriety of publishing such sentiments at the present time would remain open to strong objection. But as it is, the bias in the writer's judgment is equally cruel and unjust.

Mr. Chorley doubtless congratulates himself that Balfe never set libretto of his; since he falls foul of the composer's collaborators, and holds up to derision the verse as well as the music of his operas. But what value can be attached to a biography, professing to sum up the operas of Balfe, which omits "The Puritan's Daughter" and "The Bohemian Girl"?

Von Bülow, the Pianist—His Playing and His Mode of Teaching.

[Correspondence of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.]

FLORENCE, Italy, Oct. 28th, 1870.—Von Bülow is a small man, with a thoroughly Prussian look, and, as all fine orchestral leaders, has a military martinet air. His head is that of a soldier more than that of an artist, small, compact, hard looking as a hickory-nut. His eyes are large—à fleur de tête, as the French say—he wears a heavy brown moustache, a little Vandike beard, which hides the shape of his mouth; his forehead recedes; the crown of his head is a little bald; the ears incline back, adding to the rather sharp belligerent expression of his keen little head and face.

When I heard him play, it was, as he said, simply a musical study in his quasi atelier for his pupils; therefore I could not judge of his expression. To tell the truth, if I had only heard that, I should have said he was a dry, hard executant; but I had the chance afterwards, one morning, of being present at a lesson, and I was especially struck with the passionate expression which he threw into some passages he played over for his pupil.

The way I came to hear the lesson was by chance. I called at his rooms for a friend whose hour should have been over by that time; but a preceding lesson, in which she took great interest, had run quite over into the second hour. I asked Von Bülow if I might remain. "Certainly," he replied frankly, and bustled around in a business way to find something to amuse me, never dreaming of the great interest I should take in listening to the lesson. He handed me a little portable shelf of Italian poets—those nice miniature volumes bound in vellum and gilt. As he did so he selected Giusti's and put it into my hands. A friend in Rome has lately been making me familiar with this book, so I was for a few moments diverted from the lesson by the pungent, witty satire of one of the Brindisi, the clever one which has the refrain "Viva Arlequino." I was aroused by a sharp execution of a passage of thirds which came pouring out like a hail storm.

Von Bülow's manner of teaching is very earnest. A finger slipping on a note, a misunderstood expression of a passage, a timid execution, any slowness of comprehension, gives him exquisite, keen suffering—a looker on probably sees more than a pupil—sometimes I thought the large round eyes would roll out of his head with anguish, but the next moment the expression changed, and the face was as pleased as it had been an instant before displeased. He is extremely conscientious. It surprised me to see a man whose reputation not only as an executant, but as an orchestral leader, is so distinguished, take such real, vital interest in every detail of the mere lesson of the hour. Each pupil is treated with the same rigid, severe manner, also with the same individual interest. One of his pupils, who has been with him several years, and followed him from Munich to Florence, tells me that, for the first year or two, she shed tears at almost every lesson.

"I do not know what is the reason my pupils are all afraid of me," Bülow says; "I am sure I am very amiable—assez bon diable."

Amiable he may be au fond, but as a teacher he is an exacting, sensitive one. He is not irritable nor impatient. He loves and honors his work too much, evidently, to be either. His demands upon his pupils and nervous sensitiveness are the causes of his great influence over them; they may not like him individually, but they cannot help following his lead; he seizes upon their minds, and carries them along with him. It would be impossible to miss gaining benefit from such lessons.

He began the hour on the day I heard him, by writing off some difficult scale form in thirds, and made the pupil take it through every mode and key. This uninteresting exercise was listened to as patiently and carefully as if it had been a fine Nocturne; indeed, no patience seemed to be required—it was done con amore; and with every correction there poured from his full mind the mathematical reason in harmony, the true grammar rule. To profit by a lesson of Von Bülow's, it must be borne in mind that the pupil must be already a student, and well grounded in the orthography, etymology, and even the syntax of music.

Then followed an Etude of Moscheles, which he criticized, praised, took to pieces, put it together again; then, when he found that his pupil could not be put out in it by his severe testing, he swept it aside quickly, saying it had been studied well, "with true artistic industry." A Polonaise of Chopin had been prepared for the lesson, but after the first movement he turned the leaves swiftly, and selected a fresh one. Von Bülow loses no time; the main thing he keeps always in view; when he sees that a pupil has caught the spirit, thoroughly comprehended the meaning of the composer in a piece, that is enough. This Polonaise had been taught to his pupil carefully in preceding lessons; he saw by the first movement that she stood firm in it, so he swept it aside for a new labor.

His pupil preferred the Polonaise, Opus 26, No. 1, Von Bülow another, and it ended in her having both to prepare. Opus 26, however, was taken in hand at the lesson. At the playing of the first chords he stopped her, of course, and after showing how they should be struck, he walked up and down the room imitating with both hands in a comical, unconscious way, the manner of attacking them, crying bravo! when his pupil did as he wished, and at the slightest shadow of wrong looking as if life was at an end for him. These chords, by the way, he strikes with an inward movement, as if he was driving the sound into the piano instead of drawing it out, as he did in the succeeding passages; at these following measures he stopped the player with a sharp air, and played the whole of the first movement with a delicious expression.

"That is the true expression," he said, "and to get it you must do this." Then he took the music all to pieces, made little sums of addition on a sheet of music paper, out of the fractions of notes. Von Bülow uses his pencil a great deal in teaching. He illustrates every direction on a bit of music paper, and then pokes the pencil over his right ear, as a counting-house clerk might; his rapid, hasty writing of groups of notes is no scribbling; it is as neat and precise as if carefully, or rather slowly, done; little, clear, fine notes; no blurring, and made with sharp stems.

"It must be studied carefully," he continued, "to the smallest fraction. There may be musicians who get the expression by the grace of God and not by the grace of labor." I never did; the safest way is through hard work.

Then he again walked up and down the room, and while his pupil played, he sang the exquisite melody of the Polonaise with an expression full of pathos and passion, his hands swaying about all the while, beating time and rhythm, sometimes his fingers went as if playing on an unseen piano, and his droll, full eyes rolled about as those in Maelzel's Chess Player.

I have been thus exact in my description because the manner in which such a master as Von Bülow teaches must be interesting to every musical student and professor. Liszt said of Von Bülow to a friend of mine:

"He is the finest executant, the finest leader and the finest teacher I know of."

A great teacher the above account must surely convince you that he is. Von Bülow is uncertain about going to America this winter; he suffers from neuralgia and will not go most certainly unless he shall be in better health, which he will need to be for a concert tour.

About Bellows Boys.

AN ORGANIST'S REVENGE.

An organist, writing to the London Musical World, thus treats of a characteristic class of youths, known in almost every church in the country:

"I have had considerable to do with bellows boys in my time, and know pretty well their idiosyncrasies—the chief of which is an inconceivable ingenuity of invention and execution of mischievous pranks and capers, that in due time flower into positive diabolism. Of course, they are always smart; lithe as cats, venturous as monkeys, unconscious of reverence, defiant of decorum, oblivious of rules, aspiring and ambitious after a sort, they are the larvae of scamps, the embryo of dare-devils. Always boys, they never reach adolescence in that sphere, but emerge, I suspect, from their organ loft chrysalis into first-class acrobats, gymnasts and flying-trapeze men. There is great verisemblance in the race; its instincts ingrain, and usually similar in out-cropping, possibly a little more pronounced in individuals. They all belong to the Flibbertigibbet family, the portrait of one of whose members Sir Walter Scott has so very well limned. Victor Hugo has not happened to mention it, but it is quite certain Gavroche must at some time have done duty in the organ loft of Notre-Dame or the Madeleine. As a class, they have strong pictorial tendencies, and the white walls of their sanctum bear graphic witness to their skill in caricature and grotesque—most often, ridiculous portraits of minister, organist, or members of the choir. Nor do they disdain exploits in sculpture and engraving; and when so opulent as to possess a jack-knife, they make their mark upon door-panels and window-sills, and especially delight to adorn the smooth surfaces of sub-bass pipes with reliefs and intaglios, worth a Cellini or a Flaxman.

"Music, too, after their kind, is an intuitive fine art with them. They know every negro melody and every popular jingle that ever was written, and add too them rich variations of their own. But in a higher realm, too, they are proficient. Their imitative powers are often simply marvellous, but too often are they a little indiscreet in the display of their abilities. An under-graduate of mine had a 'Vox humana' stop of his own, that he pulled out at will, with telling effect; but unfortunately he did not always agree as to the appropriate passages for his part of the performance, and as I had no register of his larynx, the amateur had it all his own way, till we dissolved the connection. Another was inimitable in an obligato tremolo that he improvised, quite eclipsing the flutter of the French valve. There was too much organ in him, and we had to part.

"They have original and abstruse ideas of mechanics. They scorn the prosaic bellows lever, moved by manual force, and often operate by striding the fulcrum, and, adroitly shifting their poise, manage in a way not wholly orthodox. Of gregarious tastes, your true bellows boy has ever a crop of attachés, juvenile aspirants for his place, who are delighted to perform his functions in an unskilled spasmodic way, while the oligarch employs his elegant leisure in carving, pencilling or practising poses on his head.

"One specimen I had, too consummate flower of all the vagaries, all the possibilities of his class. Skim-milk eyes, hair ruddiest of the ruddy, face mottled and freckled like a rich turtle soup, limbs lank and angular as a gibbet, who could have looked for aught but tamest prose in him? Yet he was the very incarnation of madcap antics, the Alexander of unthought-of exploits. If the Apostle Paul was ever an organist, such a boy might have been his thorn. He was a spike, a crowbar, in my flesh. Upon one occasion he installed an acolyte at the 'pump' while he sought recreation in the dizzy heights and a wider prospect. I knew by the jerky pulsation that a neophyte was operating, and my wrath fast gathered, as gasp after gasp told me at any time my instrumental breath might fail, when, happening to glance upward, I beheld in close proximity to the ceiling two protuberant chalky orbs, in a halo of foxy locks, calmly surveying the external world—the appertaining head resting right over the central sixteen foot C. Oh! how I wished that great pipe had been charged with some fierce explosive, that, as by a petard, I might send that head flying into space! That wish was in vain. I could only use it as an air-gun; and, quick as thought, I struck pedal and key of the pipe beneath that couchant ear. It told. One ghastly roll of the milky eyes, a meteoric gleam of red hair, and then a thud, deep in the bowels of the organ, told me something had dropped.

"For once Flibbertigibbet lost his sang froid and precarious footing, and fell three fathoms and into disgrace, and never appeared again on that field of his flux pas.

"Henceforth, for motive power give me steam, or galvanism, or anything not in the shape of an ordinary bellows boy."

[N. B.—This is not the arrangement of stops found in the printed description of the organ supplied to the visitor, but I have re-arranged their order according to the plan usually adopted in this country, so that the English student may the more readily perceive the composition of the instrument.]

The case is of noble proportions and elaborate workmanship, occupying the whole breadth of the huge west gallery. In its flue-work there is a largeness and dignity of tone which, if not quite equal to that of the Silbermann organs, has, at least, that pungency and grandeur happily considered indispensable in all German organs, ancient and modern.

Some delicious effects were obtained from the registers on the 4th manual, notably the violas of 4, 8, and 16 ft, as well as the Salcional and Harmonic flute, but even in this enormous instrument, the reeds appear to be of secondary importance, none of them coming up to the standard of the best specimens of English or French manufacture. The pedal organ possesses an exceedingly fine tone, full of variety, character, and power.

It is in this church that the principal performances of sacred music in Leipzig take place, the leading organists of Germany being especially invited to exhibit their powers on an instrument of which the musicians and inhabitants generally are justly proud. But notwithstanding its celebrity in most matters pertaining to the musical art, and to the fact that the greatest organist and organ composer of any age or nation lived and worked in Leipzig, the city does not, I believe, contain at the present time any organist professing solo performance of the same calibre as that to be found at some other places. The organ students of the "Conservatorium" have not, therefore, the advantages in this department which they might obtain in many parts of Germany, pre-eminently in Berlin; and moreover they are compelled to "do" their practising on a very poor instrument with two manuals and a scrubby set of clumsy pedals in a small church to which they have access for this purpose. In other respects the organization of the "Conservatorium" seems to be as complete as possible, and the instruments provided for the pianoforte students are of the best, and soon renewed when worn out with much playing; still the importance of organ playing to the present generation of musicians who seek their education at this important resort of artists, would point undoubtedly to reforms of a wholesale nature in this department of musical education, unless, indeed, students are expected, after the manner of Italians, to bring their organs on their backs.

Most desirous was I of visiting the famous "Gewandhaus," the concert hall, where for a number of years the most splendid performances have been given both of new and established works, and within whose walls the first artists of the day have thought it a privilege to appear. Here it was that Mendelssohn produced some of his finest aspirations, and organized and directed, in 1838, a series of historical concerts which became celebrated, not only for the choice of works, but also for the refined excellence of their performance. It was here, too, that he re-wrote a great part of the "Hymn of Praise," the performance of which created so powerful a sensation that the King of Saxony publicly thanked the composer for the delight that it had given him, and demanded a repetition of the work. In 1843 Mendelssohn produced here his "Walpurgis Night," and the celebrated violin concerto for his friend and old playmate, Ferdinand David, the leader of the orchestra. In Leipzig, in 1847, England's favorite modern composer died, a comparatively young man, in the zenith of his power and genius.

Unfortunately my visit was made at a time of the year when no concerts are given; this was a great disappointment, and I was obliged to be content with an inspection of the building, robbed, indeed, of the vitality which it must possess at other times when the highest forms of musical composition fill its atmosphere, giving joy of the most exalted kind to the audience which throngs its walls. The great expectations one forms, so contrary to experience, of famous places, are seldom realized; my visit to the Gewandhaus was no exception to the general rule, for I found it to be very little out of the common order of edifices for similar purposes in our own country. In large letters over the orchestra, appears the motto, "Res severa est verum gaudium." The performers of the concerts number sixty, each being an artist in the true sense of the word, and a master of his instrument. The detail and ensemble of these performances are regarded by the best musical judges as exhibiting all the highest qualities of orchestral execution; and to be a member of this orchestra is generally considered throughout Europe a passport of excellence. During the season twenty performances are given, the subscription for a comfortable chair, or "stall," being £2, or 2 shillings per concert! Here we have one of the reasons why music is so popular and so well understood in Germany. The highest forms of musical composition and their perfect execution by the most celebrated artists of the day, may be frequently enjoyed at what would be regarded in England as a mere nominal charge of admission. The virtuosi who visit the British isles deem it indispensable, and are well instructed beforehand that to obtain appreciation it is necessary to ask large sums for their services; it is not too much to say that the best among the German artists would simply be laughed at were they to ask in their own country one tenth part of the fees they demand from the inhabitants of generous England. Until some check be given to the exorbitant demands of all sorts of prima donnas and public performers, good, bad, and indifferent, no real progress can be made in the art in this country, whilst its beneficent influence amongst various classes of people must be very limited. So long, however, as managers and "entrepreneurs" yield to the extravagant notions of prominent, and, as they think, indispensable performers, both vocal and instrumental, but chiefly the former, the evil will continue, and art be degraded to a mere money-making matter, and the pandering to the insane vanity of a few fortunate people, who, though they may be obtaining but small pecuniary reward in their own country, and take their places side by side with less exacting but perhaps equally talented musicians, are elevated if they come to England to positions altogether unwarrantable.

In Leipzig, as well as in all other towns of Germany, one of the essential elements of musical success is the local cultivation of music by both choral and instrumental associations formed of the inhabitants themselves, and without extraneous aid. There the system of itinerant orchestras and conductors, who drain the monied classes of subscriptions which would otherwise be devoted to local musical societies, is unknown, and would never be tolerated. And if the large provincial towns in this country do not rescue themselves from this evil custom, chiefly introduced amongst them by speculative foreigners, they will only have themselves to thank for the utter destruction of all those musical societies in which the north of England more especially prides itself so justly. It is well-known that the "starring" system has exercised the most baneful influence upon the drama in England, and precisely the same result may certainly be expected to follow the same practices with regard to music.

After an interesting interview with Dr. Richter, the author of a "Manual of Harmony," translated by the American musician, Mr. J. P. Morgan, and extensively used in that country, I left Leipzig for Dresden.

Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Beethoven's Opera, "Fidelio," was produced in Nov. 1805, at the Imperial Opera House at Vienna, under the title of "Leonora." In 1814 it was revised throughout, and put upon the stage, under its present title; since which time, no work has been a greater favorite upon the German stage. The plot is simple: Florestan, a Spanish nobleman, and intimate friend of the Prime Minister, has in some manner fallen into the power of his arch enemy, Pizarro, Governor of one of the castles of the kingdom, used as a prison, who has thrust him into one of the lowest dungeons, and is reducing his portion of bread and water daily, to destroy him with all the horrors of slow starvation. Leonora, the wife of Florestan, seeking her husband in all directions, at length has her suspicions aroused that he is in this prison, assumes male attire, and enters the service of Rocco, the head jailer.

In the opening scene we have some by play between Jacquinio, another servant, and Marcellina, daughter of Rocco, in which the girl breaks off her engagement of marriage with Jacquinio, in favor of the elegant and cultivated Fidelio. The latter comes in from the city with chains purchased for Rocco, and with letters for Pizarro. Marcellina announces her desire to marry Fidelio; old Rocco consents and blesses the union. Pizarro enters; Rocco requests him to appoint the future son-in-law his assistant, which is granted. Among the letters is one sent by a friend to the Governor, informing him that the Minister is secretly on his way to examine the prison and that he must be prepared to meet him that day. Pizarro sees that his only means of escape is in the death of the prisoner, and tempts Rocco to murder him. He refuses utterly. He then orders him to clear out an old cistern in the dungeon for a grave, and will commit the deed himself. After he retires, Fidelio persuades Rocco to allow the prisoners to come out of their dungeons into the court of the castle to inhale the fresh air, and enjoy the sunshine. They appear and she scrutinizes their faces, in hopes of finding Florestan, in vain. Pizarro, appearing again, is enraged to find the prisoners out of their cells, and Rocco excuses it as a custom upon the King's birthday, and reminds him that one is dying in the deep vaults beneath the castle.

In Act Second, we follow Rocco and his new assistant into the vaults, whither they come to dig the grave. Florestan, chained to his hard couch, is seen lying in the dim obscurity of the dungeon. The grave is dug; Fidelio trying in vain to catch a sight of the prisoner's features. She persuades Rocco to give the dying man the piece of bread and the pitcher of water they have brought with them for their refreshment. When all is ready Pizarro is called. In the first act, the Governor has ordered a watch in the tower of the castle, to give a signal upon a trumpet, the moment the Minister appears. Now the monster approaches the prisoner, ordering Fidelio to retire. She has at length seen the features of her husband, and in an agony of suspense, hides herself behind a neighboring pillar. Ordering Florestan to be loosened from his confinement, he addresses him in an aria expressive of hate, satiated vengeance, and infernal triumph—an aria, in the mouth of a competent singer, and before an audience whose knowledge of the German language enables them to feel its truthfulness, which is a masterpiece of unbridled rage and passion. He raises his dagger, and Fidelio rushes between them. "Slay first his wife!" she cries. Throwing her violently aside he raises the weapon, but she again springs before him and points a pistol to his breast. At this instant the trumpet comes faintly sounding down from the ramparts, and Florestan is saved. Pizarro, baffled, retires, and leaves the husband and wife to the joy, too great for words, which can only find vent in the sweetest sounds of music.

Here was a subject after Beethoven's own heart. No dramatic story could better embody the sentiment that burns in all his music. The struggle of the soul with destiny, of light with darkness; Joy ("Choral Symphony") Freedom, Truth, Humanity, bright ideals, natural rights and objects of the soul, postponed by human wrong and error; darkness, confinement and long suffering for the present, but glorious delivery at last by heavenly, all-conquering, human Love. The deliverance of the prisoner, made so because he "dared to utter Truth," through the high faith and persevering heroism of a devoted wife. The moral sublimity of this inspired him to his task. The fortune of his effort was alike characteristic. The first production was a failure. Vienna then, (in 1805), was occupied by the French army; the theatres were deserted; an audience of unmusical French soldiers, with but a sprinkling of friends of the true sort, found it tedious. He had written more for Art, than for the convenience of singers, and these important personages murmured at the difficulty of the music; he had enemies besides; the German libretto, adapted by Sonnleithner from an earlier one in French, was not altogether well managed; it was badly divided in three acts; the composer had not studied popular effect sufficiently, and was persuaded into endless bother of altering and re-altering. Peace restored in 1814, it was again brought out in Vienna, wisely compressed into two acts, and with many parts omitted or re-written; and in this form we have it now.

Beethoven wrote for his opera four overtures. The third, known in our concerts as the "Leonora" overture, in C, is a different treatment of ideas found in No. 2. This is by far the finest of the four, as well as by far the fittest introduction to the opera, since it is a resumé of its leading themes and incidents, and conceived in the lofty tone and spirit of the whole. Beethoven much preferred the overture in C; but many thought it too long and too great a work for the commencement, and hence he substituted the lighter and brighter overture in E, now commonly played before Fidelio. This borrows nothing from the opera itself; has on the contrary a lively and Don Juan-like expression, and only connects itself as a natural prelude to the lighter and half comic situations with which the play commences. There is only this advantage about it, that it conforms to the remarkable crescendo of the entire music, beginning with the lightest and least exciting, and grows more and more intensely tragical and grand until the climax where the prisoner is saved. The composition consists of sixteen numbers.

No. 1 is a gay and charming, half-comically serious duet, (in A), between Marcellina and Jacquinio, who presses her to name the happy day; but she, poor simpleton, is all in love with the supposed youth Fidelio. The music is Mozartian, clear and sparkling. Knocks at the door keep interrupting the luckless lover just as he thinks he is getting on so famously in his suit.

No. 2, in C minor, commencing Andante, is a sentimental Aria by Marcellina, in which she sighs and dreams of union with Fidelio, and then as the richly sombre instrumentation, "growing to a point," dashes down a scale of triplets, and quickens to a livelier movement, she gives utterance to the inspirations of hope. Mozartian still, beautifully and truly so, except in the Beethoven climax and change just mentioned.

No. 3 is unmistakably Beethoven; a few bars of his mystical and deeply shaded introduction leading into the Quartet in G. (Andante): Mir ist so wunderbar, between Marcellina, Leonora, Jacquinio and Rocco. This Canon is so exquisite, the characters so set apart in their answering and imitative phrases, (Marcellina longing and hoping for Fidelio; Leonora painfully conscious of it, yet countenancing the illusion, intent on her great purpose and its dangers; Rocco, too, noticing it and liking the idea well; Jacquinio, his "hair on end" at sight of his poor prospects), that it is always greatly relished and encored.

No. 4. Rocco's song in praise of money;—the least important number in a musical point of view, though it might pay the best.

The music waxes in warmth and inspiration, and in richness of ideas, in No. 5, a Trio, full of life and movement, in which Rocco applauds Fidelio's courageous determination to enter the prison service, tells him (her) he will succeed by perseverance, that the heart gets hardened by familiarity with horrors; she trusts in God and her heart's pure purpose; Marcellina hints that love, too, is a motive worth consideration.

Nos. 6 and 7. A quick march heralds the entrance of Pizarro, who sings an Aria, (D minor), with chorus, a terrific outburst of vengeful rage and hatred, in which he gloats with fiendish delight upon the thought that he shall soon have the heart's blood of Florestan, his fallen enemy and prisoner. The orchestra is lashed into a tempest, and we have the Beethoven energy under its most fearful aspect. The effect is marvellously enhanced, where, as the song thunders along in D major, a low, whispered chorus of the guards, in B flat, comes in: "He talks of death, &c."

No. 8. Duet of basses, in which Pizarro proposes to Rocco to make way with the prisoner, but, he refusing, declares his intention to do the dark deed himself; so his revenge will taste the sweeter; but Rocco must prepare a grave by the old cistern in the cell. The contrasted feelings of the two men are powerfully and wonderfully depicted in the music, which, with Beethoven's dark and mysterious modulations, is singularly suggestive and exciting.

No. 9 is the great recitative and Aria of Leonora, who has overheard the plot: Abentheuer! wo eilt du hin? (Monster! to what art thou hastening!) It is a piece constructed like the scene in this Fidelio.

schütz: first a recitative, in which the orchestra, (Allegro agitato), depicts her horror and alarm at the thought of his cruel "tiger sense," but yields to the rainbow of hope which rises in her mind at the thought that she may save her husband; then a heavenly Adagio, (in E), with prelude and accompaniment of mellow horn and bassoon tones; "Come Hope, let not the last star of the weary pale; however distant the goal, Love will reach it," &c.; then an Allegro of immense fire and energy: "I follow the inward impulse!" with rapid running accompaniments of horns and reeds in full chords, exceedingly effective and inspiring. For orchestra and singer it is the most difficult, as well as perhaps the grandest scene of the kind in any opera.

No. 10. Finale of the first act. Chorus of the prisoners, who are let out to greet the light. A wonderfully beautiful piece of music, pervaded by an orchestral figure which indicates the light and buoyant sense of "breathing the free air;" the strain alternates with dark allusions to the prison cells; it is full of answering phrases of the voices; and one, a tenor, sings a strain of gratitude and trust in God; then all unite again in a thrilling climax upon the word Freiheit, (freedom)! Then come whispered cautions: we are watched; then voices after voice again, as at first, fall into the original strain: "Oh what delight, in the free air, &c." As the prisoners withdraw, there is a dialogue between Fidelio and Rocco. Her desire to go down into the cells with him is granted. This is spoken dialogue, followed by recitative; then in an Allegro molto movement he informs her of their first task, to dig that grave, alludes to the poor half-starved prisoner, &c. She hopes to see her husband, and so does not shrink. Then the duet assumes a flowing Andante movement in six-eight rhythm, in which the ear is charmed, but the soul shudders: "We must straight to work." "I follow, were it to my death," &c. Then Marcellina and Jacquino rush in and give the alarm: Pizarro comes in a great rage that the prisoners are out. The jailer's excuses are quite touching: "The coming in of Spring—the cheerful warm sunlight—and then (a touch of patriotism) it is the king's Namensfest." The poor prisoners are ordered back, and their exquisitely pathetic chorus: "Farewell, thou warm sunlight," with expressive orchestral accompaniment, and with the quintet of principal characters, (each characteristic: Marcellina and Jacquino commiserating Fidelio full of his purpose, Pizarro urging on the jailer, the latter lamenting his cruel duty), brings the act to a grand musical and dramatic conclusion. Nothing could be finer than this Finale, which is thoroughly original and Beethovenesque.

We proceed briefly to describe the contents of the second Act.

No. 11. It opens with a remarkable instrumental introduction of some thirty measures, very slow, (Grave), in F minor, and sublime in its suggestion of a high soul languishing in chains, in dreary solitude and darkness. The loud, long bursts of the wind instruments, in full chords, answering to the low monotone of the strings; the plaintive exclamations of the 'celli, echoed by violins and oboes; the symphonic accompaniment of the drums (in minor fifths) to the wild diminished seventh chords, &c., lend a singular impressiveness to this prelude to the gloom of Florestan's cell, and to the prisoner's touching recitative. "God, what darkness! O heavy trial!" and with a change of key, (to E major): "I murmur not, God's will is just." A beautiful modulation to A flat introduces the exquisite tenor melody, (Adagio cantabile), which forms a leading feature in the "Leonora" overture (No. 3). In this song all the tenderness and sweetness of Beethoven's heart flow out. The words are:

In the Spring-time of my life
I dared to boldly tell the truth,
And chains are my reward.
Willingly I suffer every pain,
And an ignominious end,
With the sweet consolation in my heart,
That I have done my duty.

The music quickens to an Allegro, (in F), as in a sort of "tranquil inspiration bordering on delirium," the prisoner thinks he feels a softer air about him, and sees as it were an angel of deliverance, in the form of Leonora! Such a scene demands the very best of tenors.

No. 12 opens with a piece of "Melodrama." Short, expressive bits of instrumentation prelude to the brief sentences of spoken dialogue between Rocco and his new assistant, Fidelio, (Leonora), who have come down into the cell to dig the grave. Leonora: "How cold it is here in this subterranean vault!" Rocco, (pointing to the prisoner): "There he is!" L. "God stand by me if it is he!" &c. Then follows the marvellous duet, in A minor, Andante con moto, in which they proceed to dig, she watching the prisoner, as Rocco's back is bent, during the prelude,

The orchestral part, in dull, ponderous triplets, is descriptive of their work, and the contrast of their voices, (the old jailer exhorting to fresh efforts, Fidelio brave, but almost fainting), is wonderfully expressive. At length, with a struggling, upward rousade of the double basses, a great stone is heaved up, and on goes the work again to the same movement, she more and more overcome by fatigue and terror, but still anxiously scrutinizing the poor prisoner. This duet, not difficult for orchestra or singers, is such as only Beethoven's imagination could have invented, and cannot but be heard with thrilling interest. Indeed how the spell of this tragic music deepens and grows upon you with more and more intensity, as the dark drama proceeds! Musically and dramatically, nothing in the whole range of opera is more exciting than this whole Act.

No. 13. A most lovely Terzetto, between Florestan, Leonora and Rocco; a sweet, flowing Allegro, in A major, smooth and melodious enough for Mozart, and yet the tenderness and depth are Beethoven's. The prisoner asks heaven's blessing on the youth who shows such human interest; Leonora, now persuaded that he is her husband, is agitated by heavenliest hopes and fears; she has a bit of bread which she would give him; the jailer is touched, but hints that it is forbidden. Wonderful is the modulation just here, as Fidelio coaxingly suggests: It can do no harm, it is soon all over with him! The bread is given, and the Trio kindles to a brighter blaze of feeling. This Trio would be exquisite without the action, sung as a concert piece, if well accompanied; but with true, fervent, natural action, it is as pure a fusion of situation, character and music, as purely lyrical a moment, as any in Don Juan.

No. 14. Quartet, Allegro con brio, in D. Pizarro steals in, throws off his dark mantle and reveals himself to the prisoner: "Pizarro, whom thou wouldst have overthrown, Pizarro the avenger, stands before thee!" The agitated music yields for a moment to a heroic, measured strain of horns and trumpets, as Florestan with composure replies: "A murderer stands before me." He lifts the dagger, when Leonora throws herself before her husband. He flings the rash youth back; she covers him again: "Tödt' erst sein Weib! (kill first his wife!) she screams upon a high note—the climax of the opera. "His wife!" "My wife!" exclaim Pizarro, Rocco, Florestan; the swift quartet proceeds until Pizarro seeks to kill them both, when she presents a pistol to his breast, and just then, in a changed key (B flat), resounds faintly from behind the scenes the trumpet announcing the arrival (so dreaded by Pizarro) of the Minister. It is the well-known trumpet passage of the "Leonora" overture. "A few wonderfully expressive bars, in which the wild delight of Leonora and Florestan ("Thou art (I am) saved!"), the mortification and curses of Pizarro, and the joyful astonishment of the old jailer find utterance, and again the trumpet strain rings nearer and louder. The quartet closes with a breathless Allegro, like clouds flying before the wind, that sweeps the dull skies clear,—the only piece of music that ever reminded us at all of the quick part of the Sextet in Don Juan.

No. 15. Duet between Leonora and Florestan, expressing the joy of meeting after such a separation: O namen—namenlose Freude! (O joy beyond expression!) It is a rapturous Allegro vivace movement of indescribable beauty, and the true Beethoven inspiration. Its animated rhythm, its alternate mingling and separation of voices, (which now, by short ecstatic responses, and now flowing together, seem literally to rush into each others arms, and then to hold each other off, as if to realize the union with distinct assurance), the directness, simplicity and earnestness of the main melody, and then the delicious strangeness of the modulation with each new flash of thought or new shade of emotion; all is full of joy and love, and gratitude and wonder, of sense of trial past and heavenly reward, a whole eternity in one miraculous and glorious moment.

No. 17. Finale. Scene the court yard of the prison. A quick and buoyant march (in C), accompanies the entrance of the Minister and his train. The stage fills with men and women. Pizarro, as governor of the prison, accompanies the Minister; on the other side the prisoners come forth, with Marcellina and Jacquino. The march becomes accompaniment to a grand burst of full chorus: "Hail to the day, the much longed for, yet unexpected, when Justice and Mercy appear before the door of our prison grave!" Fernando, the Minister, (basso), announces the royal mercy and deliverance to the prisoners, (they are supposed to be political prisoners). Again a snatch of chorus: "Hail to the day!" Old Rocco comes in, leading Leonora and Florestan. The Minister, astounded, recognizes his dear, his noble friend, whom he had supposed dead, Rocco relates the plot and the deliverance: Pizarro is denounced. "And Leonora," adds old Rocco. "Leonora?" "Yes the ornament of womanhood I lead before you!" Pizarro would interpose "two words," but is silenced. The prisoner's chains are taken off; it is the wife's privilege to do it. In all this hurried recitative, the orchestra keeps up a continuous movement, full of life and complex beauty; and finally the key gets back to the broad sunlight of C major, (the key of the Leonora overture which Beethoven intended to commence the work), and the whole concludes with a grand ensemble of chorus, with quintet of principals, in praise of Leonora and of woman's high devotion, borrowing the first lines from Schiller's "Hymn to Joy":

"Who a gentle wife has won, Join he in our jubilee! &c."

Music Abroad.

LONDON.—The Beethoven Concerts at the Crystal Palace are going on prosperously. Since our last reference to them the Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5 have been given. The "D major" full of exuberant life and genial humor, with a largo rarely surpassed in melodious grace; the "B flat," of colossal proportions, first christened "Bonaparte," and subsequently rechristened "Eroica," in which the aspiring musician unanswerably established his claim to the position he has since maintained with easy pre-eminence at the head of orchestral composers; the "B flat," prodigal of original fancy, comprising an adagio of ineffable beauty with a finale, the spirit of which seems uncontrollable; and the "C minor," which many amateurs, not without colorable pretext, regard as "the symphony of symphonies," have all been heard in the order which belongs to them. Each, too, has been, on the whole, superbly played, as even fastidious judges, who may object that the first movement of the "Eroica" and the adagio of the "B flat" were taken just a shade too fast, must allow. Further, we have had the overture to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus," a ballet (fancy Beethoven at work upon a ballet!) composed in 1800, and produced at Vienna the year following—the first of Beethoven's overtures which ever became familiar in this country; the third pianoforte concerto (in C minor), with Miss Agnes Zimmermann, a worthy executant of the solo part; and, most noticeable of all, the four overtures written for Fidelio,—the first three (in the key of C major), generally known as the "overtures to Leonora," placed, in immediate succession, at the beginning of the concert, the last (in E), accepted for a long period as the "overture to Fidelio," as though the other three had not been in existence, at the end. The introduction of these overtures in one and the same programme was tried by Mendelssohn at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, in 1840—with what complete success is recorded by Schumann in one of his most genuine criticisms. We doubt if even on that occasion, with Mendelssohn himself as conductor, the overtures were played with more careful finish or more hearty enthusiasm than at the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. Manns, on Saturday afternoon, when, the great C minor symphony not excepted, they formed unquestionably the chief attraction. The close attention with which they were listened to, by the most crowded audience of the season, and the applause at the end of each, were conclusive evidences of the interest which this novel and extraordinary presentation of Beethoven had excited. Anything more instructive, indeed, to those who study the higher manifestations of genius with befitting earnestness, than to watch the development of the great musician's thoughts in that of the first three overtures—if not, as Schumann says, from an acorn to an oak, at least [comparatively], from a sapling to an oak—could hardly be imagined. Again, when finding that all which possibly could be got out of his first idea had been obtained, the bold confidence which, at the revival of Fidelio in 1814 [nine years after its first production], induced Beethoven to prepare a fourth overture in a different key, in quite a different style, and yet after its manner as genuine and fine as any of the others, is a fresh source of interest to the admirers of his music. The separation of this overture from its predecessors at Saturday's concert was a wise arrangement on the part of Mr. Manns.

Independently of Beethoven, the instrumental department of these concerts, as usual, has offered much to commend unreservedly. No symphonies, except those of Beethoven, it is true, have been included in the programmes; but, to atone for this, overtures of merit by other composers have been given; as, for example, Schumann's impassioned Genoese; Rossini's brilliant Sieg de Corinthe; M. Gounod's pastoral, Mirille—so well played that the absence of its composer, whose appearance at the concert had been looked for, caused general regret; the well-known Midsummer Night's Dream and Ruy Blas of Mendelssohn; and last, not least, Professor Sterndale Bennett's Paradise and the Peri, the first performance of which at the Crystal Palace Concerts was welcomed with such unanimity that, like the Natades of the same composer, it may be now safely regarded as one of the future stock pieces of Mr. Manns' repertory. In addition to all this, the greatest of existing performers on the double bass, Signor

Bottesini, has appeared once more, showing, by a marvellous execution of his own fantasia on themes from Lucia di Lammermoor, that his power of astonishing and delighting an audience in equal degree remains as of yore.—Musical World, Nov. 5.

LEIPZIG.—The Euterpe Musical Association will give ten concerts this season. Herr Volkland will be the conductor, and Herr Svendsen, from Christiana, the leader.—The Berlin Domechor will shortly give a concert here.—The concert given at the Gewandhaus for the wounded and the survivors of those who have fallen of the 12th Armeé corps, was very numerously attended. Herr Carl Reinecke composed a "Fest Ouverture" expressly for the occasion. Herr Gura sang an air from Euryanthe, together with songs by Schubert and Löwe. Mlle. Hauffe performed Mozart's D minor Concerto, and Mlle. Bosse gave an air from Iphigénie auf Tauris.

MUNICH.—A regular performance of Die Walpurgisnacht was to be given on the 4th of November, the day of Mendelssohn's death.—A colossal bust of Beethoven, by Professor Conrad Knoll, has created a great sensation at the exhibition of the Art Association. Herr Franz Lachner, who, in his youth, was on intimate terms with Beethoven, says that the bust is the finest and best likeness he ever saw.—At the Royal Operahouse the following works will shortly be performed: Iphigénie auf Tauris, Gluck (words by Edward Devrient); Rigoletto, Verdi (with Mlle. Kaufmann, Herren Kindermann and Nachbaur); Die Minnenfahrten [Jocunde], Isouard; and Rienzi, Herr R. Wagner, the only one of that composer's operas not yet performed here. On the 5th December, the day of Mozart's death, Don Juan is to be brought out with entirely new scenery, dresses, and decorations, besides a partly new libretto. People complained very justly that Don Juan and Die Zauberflöte had disappeared from the repertory. The reason was that the management had no scenery worthy of these two masterpieces, and they could not take the artists off Herr R. Wagner's literary and musical marvels. However, a better era appears to be now dawning.

To the London Musical World we are indebted for the foregoing items, as well as for the two which follow:

Herr R. Wagner's "Festgabe," or "Festival Gift," to the centenary of the composer of Fidelio, in December, will shortly be published by Herr E. W. Fritsch. It is an oration in the grand style, and a contribution to the philosophy of music, the title being, Beethoven, von Richard Wagner.

The Beethoven Festival at the National Hungarian Theatre, in Pesth, will take place on the 16th, 17th, and 18th December. On the first evening, Goethe's Egmont, with Beethoven's music, will be performed, and, on the second, Fidelio. On the third evening, there will probably be a grand concert in the Redouten-Saal. In consequence of a request made by the Intendant, Baron Felix Orszy, the Abbate Franz Liszt has promised to conduct the concert. Simultaneously with Baron Orszy's request, the Abbate received a similar one from Vienna, for him to conduct the Beethoven Festival there, but he decided in favor of Pesth. The programme of the concert will, in all probability, comprise the Ninth Symphony, and Liszt's Beethoven-Cantata. It is said, too, that the Abbate will play one of the great composer's Pianoforte Concertos.

PARIS. A Tribune correspondent (Nov. 3) writes:

Attempts are being continued to animate us by a little music and occasional dramatic performances. To-day, or rather yesterday, for the chimes of La Trinité have just struck the half-hour after 5, of the 4th November, we had a religious ceremony at the Madeleine. Cherubini's requiem in ut minor, and the funeral march from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, were the musical selections accompanying the mass, between which and the offertory we had an address from the Abbé Duquerry. It was admirably suited to the occasion, and his picture of the desolation of France at the present moment created a great sensation. The Abbé has lost none of his old fire and power of language. The musical department was the gratuitous contribution of the Society of Concerts of the Conservatoire, which mustered in force, and did its part excellently. The ceremony was for the benefit of the wounded, some half-dozen of whom occupied seats at the side of the left nave. Mlle. Favart, of the theatre Français, collected. She seemed to have great success.

- *First time in these Concerts. *First time in Boston.

We have long thought that it would be an interesting study for our music-lovers to hear all the four introductions which Beethoven composed for his one great Opera, so as to compare them, noting the successive efforts by which he only in the third trial fully wrought out the idea which was in his mind from the first; (the fourth was built of wholly different ideas and with another purpose.) Such a study is like an introduction into the magician's laboratory; we witness one of his most sublime creations in the process of becoming. We copy, (elsewhere) from the London Athenæum and the Musical World, some interesting remarks after a recent performance of those overtures in the Crystal Palace Concerts. We have also taken the liberty to reprint our own mere sketch of the whole opera, made several years ago, partly to aid the understanding of the overtures, and partly in anticipation of a performance of "Fidelio" during the Birthday week by the English Opera Company, who are then to occupy the Boston Theatre. We could hardly venture here so bold an undertaking as the giving of all four Overtures in one concert, as Mr. Manns has done in London; nor would that be quite consistent with our notions of a programme. Mendelssohn, to be sure, set the example in Leipzig in 1840; but there is only one Leipzig; and even then there were but two of them set down in the programme; the enthusiastic audience clamored for the rest, and the Gewandhaus orchestra was equal to the task of gratifying them upon the spot without rehearsal! Here is the "golden" note which Schumann made of that achievement (we translate too literally to do it gracefully):

"It ought to be printed in golden letters what the Leipzig orchestra performed last Thursday: all four overtures to 'Fidelio' one after the other. Thanks, ye Viennese of 1805, that the first one did not take hold of you, until Beethoven in a godlike furor hurled out one after another. If ever he seemed powerful to me, it was on that evening, when we could overhear him better than ever in his workshop,—moulding, rejecting, altering,—ever hot and glowing, in the midst of his labor. Most gigantic did he show himself perhaps in the second onset. The first overture would not please; hold, thought he, hear the second and go wild,—and he set himself to work anew, and let the thrilling drama itself pass before them, and sang the great sorrows and the great joys of his noble lovers once again. It is demoniacal, this second Overture; in some of its details even bolder than the third, the well known mighty one in C. For even this did not content him; so he put it aside, and only retained single pieces from it, out of which, in a more calm, artistic way, he formed the third. Later followed that easier and more popular one in E major, with which 'Fidelio' is commonly opened in the theatre.—Such is the great Four-Overture work. In the same way that Nature fashions her productions, we see in it first the tangled roots, out of which in the second the gigantic trunk rears itself, spreads out its arms to the left and to the right, and finally concludes with light and graceful foliage and blossoms."

We too, all of us, who listened for the first time to that first Overture, can thank "the Viennese" for provoking the composer into giving us three more; but we cannot thank them for consigning so beautiful, so ideal a creation to comparative obscurity. Our feeling is that this No. 1 stands by itself, a thing complete and altogether lovely, the product of a deep, sweet, tender feeling; while No. 2, much bolder in its reach, more thrilling in its grand melodramatic effect of the trumpet scene, &c., is interesting chiefly as a rough, crude sketch of the inimitable No. 3. The pervading tone of feeling in the first is gentle, quiet and reflective; it begins with a musing soliloquy of the violin,—a thinking over as it were in memory of "my prisons,"—after time has healed the wounds and wrought sweet reconciliation. The tragedy is past when this is written; the sentiment remains, a meditation on the beauty of the wife's devotion and the noble love of Leonora and her martyr husband; this lends the deep, warm, quiet inspiration to the Overture. Naturally it was too unexciting, too fine, too idyllic, to make a hit at once in a Viennese theatre filled in great part with French soldiers. So he set to work to give them something more effective, more dramatic, even melodramatic, without being any the less a noble work of art. To do so, in the first attempt, he breaks the perfect spell: the rounded unity of the first prelude, retaining and placing at once in the foreground, as the heart and central motive of the drama, the prison aria of the Tenor, which here is introduced towards the end, and keeping up a family resemblance in the general character of themes and phrases; so much so that the yearning, soaring, syncopated swift melody that pervades the second and third Overtures, seems naturally and logically born out of the first, although only vaguely hinted there.—The Overture lacked neither fire nor delicacy in the rendering, and it produced, we think, a general desire that it shall not again become a stranger to us.

The "Preludes" of Liszt are too well-known to need analysis. The difficult work had been very thoroughly rehearsed, and was so rendered as to bring its traits of power and beauty into clearer light than ever. It is, as we have said before, the most reasonable of the Symphonische Dichtungen which we have yet heard; and it certainly contains not only fine effects of instrumentation, but some truly beautiful themes and passages (such as the lovely Cantabile of the 'cello, and the pastoral part, which so reminds one of a part of Spohr's Weihe der Töne, and some grand, imposing climaxes.

The Storm episode, however, seems to us a mere effect piece, commonplace in conception as compared with Beethoven's, who does more with smaller means. We feel a certain unrelieved, oppressive heaviness and hardness, too, in the frequent recurrence of the stronger motive; and, after all is over, as if it were a thing of ingenious details, rather than a vital whole; a succession of pleasing or startling sensations, which have not raised us into the serene, clear element of Art.

All the more grateful both to ear and soul was the delightful, naïve, simple Symphony by Haydn. There was music honestly and naturally come by, not the result of overstrained ambition to achieve unheard of things; music which seems to have sprung up like the flowers; music sincere and heart-felt, joyfully and gratefully at one with the good spirit of the universe. Haydn was chosen for the Symphonist this time, as opening the series of the great ones who preceded and succeeded Beethoven. This Symphony in C minor was new to our audience. It is not one of the greatest, but there are few more beautiful, or more refreshing to hear after Liszt. On a much smaller canvass and with fewer colors, yet the moaning and essential music of it go more surely to the heart. The Finale is indeed a remarkable movement, holding the violins to vigorous, sustained work.

The Overture by Rietz (Mendelssohn's successor at the Gewandhaus, for ten years now Kapellmeister at Dresden) made a good cheerful, festal finale to the concert. It is a genial, pleasing work, richly instrumented, and much in the vein of Mendelssohn, reminding you particularly of the opening of the Italian Symphony.

Mr. LISTEMANN was fully equal to the smooth, liquid, fluent passages of the Lipinski Concerto, and played it admirably. The composition itself is hardly of importance enough for concerts of this order: but it chanced to be the best thing at once available in the non-arrival of the parts of the concerto by Viotti, which, with much other music for these concerts, ordered four months ago from Germany, has thus far failed to reach us. But the Chaconne of Bach made glorious compensation. Noblest, richest, and most satisfying of all compositions for the violin alone, you follow the unfolding of its large thought from the first bold, fiery chords with breathless interest to the end. It is something inexhaustible; you still long for more. Not only in its thoughts, its spirit, is it always fresh; but it anticipates nearly all of the modern violin effects. As a violin work it is complete in itself; but in larger halls it is commonly given with Mendelssohn's piano accompaniment; this by Schumann, which is less known, adds more positive support to it, is more in the spirit of Bach, and is a task of difficulty enough to need an artist of Mr. LEONARD's calibre.—The general impression of the concert seems to have been highly satisfactory, all agreeing that the orchestra has really improved.

This week's concert (the third) offered the second of the "Leonore" Overtures; the charming little Aria and Gavotte from Bach's Orchestral Suite in D; for Symphony, the "Jupiter" (in C) of Mozart, next in order of the great Symphonists before Beethoven.—Part II. Overture to "Fanciulla" by Ch. rubini; Schubert's Fantasia, Op. 15, played by Mr. LANG, as arranged for Piano and Orchestra by Liszt; and Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. The Overtures to "Leonore," No. 2, and to "Fanciulla" were new to Boston.

THE BEETHOVEN CENTENNIAL. The programme of the Birthday Week in Boston is settled, we presume, in its main features, though some societies and artists are still in doubt what they will do. The want of a fit hall for Chamber Concerts proves one serious drawback. The series of Beethoven performances will begin, according to the original plan, with the FOURTH HARVARD SYMPHONY CONCERT on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 15, when the programme will include: Part I. The third and greatest Overture to "Leonore;" the great Soprano Scene from "Fidelio," to be sung by Mme. BERTHA JOHANNSEN; Seventh Symphony in A.—Part II. Andante and Adagio from the "Prometheus" Ballet; and the Choral Fantasia, with Mr. PERABO for pianist, a select choir from the Handel and Haydn Society, and Orchestra. The Choral Fantasia, as it contains the germ of the Choral Symphony, will be interesting to hear so soon before the performance of that sublime work on the 19th. To give our readers a better idea of it beforehand, we copy the following from a German writer:

"This," he says, "is a gentle prelude to the Ninth Symphony, a parallel piece to that sublime creation taken from the domain of the graceful and delicious. It begins with a long continued solo on the piano-forte. The master in a state of dreamy thought or reverie seems to be preluding upon the instrument to which he has been appointed, and while his fingers are gliding carelessly over the keys the soul is apparently collecting itself. Here all is vague and unconnected. Themes come peeping up only to be lost in broad arpeggios, and no distinct form comes out in all this flood of tones. Out of patience with his poor success, the composer calls upon the orchestra to help him give expression to the feeling which is struggling within for utterance. At first the Contrabass answers in a sort of recitative figure, and after the other instruments have fallen in one by one, the piano-forte gives out a melody, which is singularly like the 'Freude, schöner Götterfunken,' in the Ninth Symphony; and in which our Tone-Poet at length has found that means of expression he has so long been seeking. Now the orchestra divides itself into groups, curiously examining the newly-found theme, throwing it about and varying it in all sorts of playful ways. The flutes pass it to the oboes; they to the clarinets and bassoons; then the string quartet gets possession of it, and finally we get it from the rejoicing chorus of all the instruments. Still there is more in it than piano-forte and orchestra can make known; there is yet something more to be expressed. They do not yet give up the attempt, but vary it into new forms, lead it through the most manifold harmonic changes, and at last repeat it in the minor, as if angry at their own weakness. At last, near the close, the human voice comes to their assistance, a full chorus joins the quartet, and surrounded as with a halo of tones from the joyous instruments, sounds forth the 'The Praise of Harmony.'"

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT, which was to have closed the series on the evening of the birthday itself (Saturday, the 17th), is postponed to Monday afternoon, Dec. 19, owing to the engagement of many members of the orchestra at the theatres on Saturday afternoon and evening. This concert will be given under the joint auspices of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Harvard Musical Association. The Symphony will be preceded by a short First Part, consisting of the following selections from Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont;" Quartet from "Fidelio;" Andante and Adagio from "Prometheus;" Hallelujah Chorus from "The Mount of Olives." (Tickets at $1.00, for sale at the Music Hall on and after Dec. 10.)

It is more than probable that "Fidelio" will be given on the Saturday evening of the Birthday (and possibly on other evenings of that week) by the united Richings and Parepa English Opera troupes at the Boston Theatre. They are to give it in New Haven next week.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, who will return to Boston in season to take part in these festivities, will, besides rejoining the orchestra, give a Chamber Concert of their own in honor of Beethoven, probably on the Friday evening, at the Piano Rooms of Mr. Russell Hallet, Tremont St. The programme will consist of one of Beethoven's earlier Piano Trios, the entire Septet, one of his latest (posthumous) Quartets, and some songs.—Mr. ERNST PERABO has already announced his purpose of giving a Beethoven Concert at Horticultural Hall on the Birthday (Saturday) at noon. Other artists probably have similar intentions, but their plans are not yet stated. Enough, however, is already sure to make a Commemoration worthy of Beethoven and of Boston.

NILSSON AGAIN.—We had no room to give our notes in order on the Nilsson Concerts. Let us go back and gather up a few.

Of the second concert the main feature was the Mad Scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet." Of the music itself we could hardly venture an opinion, so absorbed were we in the wonderfully dramatic revelation of the singer and the actress. It showed a true and rare dramatic genius. Such an impersonation of Ophelia we have not seen before. Such swift and perfect changes of expression; the voice, the quality of tone always in quick sympathy with look and action; such alternation of violent mad mirth and wild despair and pretty maiden dreams of friends and love and pleasure; such beauty and such startling power of song, were worth going far to witness. And it was as a whole beautiful; whereas we commonly would rather turn away from these questionable stage imitations of the morbid anatomy of passion. She also sang the Ave Maria of Gounod (they have done mentioning Bach at all in this business!), in a high and pure religious style, nobly sustained by the violin obligato of M. VIEUXTEMPS; and the "Last Rose of Summer," with Swedish dance air and "Old folks at home" for encores.

Third Concert, Monday, Nov. 7. A tender and poetic French air ("Kennst du das Land?") from Thomas's "Mignon," sung with refined and subdued feeling, and the Miserere from "Il Trovatore," were her principal selections. The latter was given on her part with such thrilling vocal and dramatic power and intensity, that we almost enjoyed the hacknied scene for once. BRIGNOLI, outside, sang the tenor solo, with chorus of monks, entirely too loud; nor were the sounds subdued to due proportion in the repetition which was wildly insisted upon.

Fourth Concert, Nov. 8. Best programme of the whole series. Mlle. Nilsson sang two Arias by Mozart: first, the Recitative and Air: "Non più di fiori" from "Tito," with clarinet obligato—(it was a pretty, but a silly freak, however, to drag the clarinetist to the front); and then, for encore, Cherubino's song: "Voi che sapete." Both were sung with pure artistic style and feeling, although our "East Wind" had been trifling with the singer's throat. The recitative was truly noble. But first, in charming contrast, we should have mentioned the airy, playful little Duet by Blangini (better known in parlors here some two score years ago), which she sang in sotto voce with Sig. Brignoli. It was lady-like grace and playfulness itself. Here voice and smile were one. The Tenor, too, did well in the little responsive phrases. "Auld Robin Gray" was sung with such a power and truth of pathos, as we have not heard before since Jenny Lind. This programme was further rich in one of the most interesting of the Violin compositions of Vieuxtemps, his "Fantasia Appassionata;" in the subdued, rich "Reverie" composed by him for Orchestra; in the Page's song from the Huguenots (Miss CARY); the Rossini Trio: "Zitti, zitti," (Miss Cary, Brignoli and Verger), &c., &c. Ballad encores as usual.

Matinee, Sat. Nov. 12. Enormous crowd. Programme mostly repetitions. For Nilsson: "Angels ever bright and fair," which we liked better this time; Ophelia's mad scene; Ballads as usual ("Home," Dalecarlian Dance, "Old Folks"). Miss Cary did not appear. For Verger, "Largo al Factotum," in his genteel, refined way. For Vieuxtemps: the "Faust" Fantasia again; a beautiful Lento movement, followed by his "St. Patrick's Day" extravaganza; and the Theme with Variations from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, in which the piano part was played with thoroughly artistic style by Miss MARIE KRZES, from Dresden, where her father is Kapellmeister, who, though very young, has taken a high rank among piano virtuosos in Europe. Her principal selection, a Fantasia by Liszt on "Don Giovanni," did not afford much opportunity to judge of her as to the higher qualities of expression, but it showed a marvellous power and perfection of technical execution.

Sixth, Nov. 14. Another Lisztian Fantasia by Miss KRZES. Wonderful again in execution, but somehow a kind of playing which does not win by any marked individuality. The fanciful little piece (by Rubinstein?) which she gave for encore, was indeed fascinating. But we are to hear her sometime hence in music of a nobler range; she is to play the E flat Concerto in the last Beethoven concert of the Harvard series. Her manner is entirely natural and unaffected. We have reason to know, too, from our acquaintance with all the principal works of all the great composers, from Bach to Rubinstein, and her ability to play them from memory, is as remarkable as her execution. This time NILSSON sang the "King of Thule" ballad and the Jewel Song from Gounod's Faust,—not in her best spirit, something had ruffled its serenity; also in the Quartet from Martha,—rather a weak selection. But she was saving herself, no doubt, for the great effort, "Let the bright Seraphim," in which, as we have said, she showed a sustained power and splendor of voice which she had been keeping in reserve till then. The effect was electric.

Seventh. Grandest of all Nilsson's efforts was the great dramatic scene of Beethoven: "Ah! Perfido," in which she sounded the whole gamut of passion. It was given with orchestra, of course, and was felt, we think, by all to be an instance of great and noble singing. Surely the response of the entire audience both after this and after the Mozart Arias should encourage the management to put in their programmes more of the music which is most worthy of a noble singer. Rossini's "Una voce" was also sung by her in a most sparkling, subtle and enchanting style, with quite a dash of originality.

The closing Matinée was rather a sentimental, popular farewell occasion. "Let the bright Seraphim," [even better than before, and with improvement in the trumpet part by Mr. Gilmore], and the Miserere scene were repeated. For the rest Mlle. Nilsson sang only Ballads,—the same three or four that have figured in all her concerts. We never heard ballad singing which we liked better; but the variety was certainly too limited. Why not more Swedish melodies?

Music in New York.

NILSSON IN ORATORIO.—Steinway Hall was of course filled when Mlle. Nilsson sang in Oratorio for the first time in this country. The Sun says of the performance:

Miss Nilsson fully justified the great reputation that she brought to this country as an oratorio singer. There were many who at her concerts objected to her method of singing "Angels ever bright and fair," and who, founding their anticipations on that performance, concluded that Miss Nilsson's oratorio singing would be characterized by an over-strained sentiment, and much liberty with the time and even with the notes of the composer.

But these anticipations proved entirely erroneous. Miss Nilsson sang Handel's music in a most devout spirit, with a reverent regard for the music as the composer wrote it, and for the sacred text. Her spirit was certainly in perfect accord with the theme, and she unfolded to us more completely than at any previous occasion the secret of her great reputation.

There was, in the first place, a unity about the performance such as there never has been at her concerts. In place of the scattered fragments of song, first about one subject and then about another, the whole was knit together in sentiment. The key of feeling that the orchestra set with the solemn introduction was sustained to the end. And Miss Nilsson did everything to keep that feeling intact. She laid aside the debonnaire manner that she is accustomed to wear at her concerts, and was in manner in accord with the occasion. Her voice seems specially adapted by its exquisite purity to sacred music, and in her singing of the great solos "Rejoice Greatly," "How Beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of

Beethoven.

PROLOGUE, written and recited by WILLIAM W. STORY at the Inauguration of the Statue in the Boston Music Hall, March 1, 1856.

Lift the veil;—the work is finished;—fresh created from the hands
Of the artist,—grand and simple, there our great Beethoven stands.

Clay no longer—he has risen from the buried mould of earth,
To a golden form transfigured by a new and glorious birth.
Art hath bid the evanescent pause and know no more decay;
Made the mortal shape immortal, that to dust has passed away.

There's the brow by thought o'erladen, with its tempest of wild hair;
There the mouth so sternly silent and the square cheeks seamed with care;

There the eyes so visionary, straining out, yet seeing naught
But the inward world of genius, and the ideal forms of thought;

There the hand which gave its magic to the cold, dead, ivory keys,
And from out them tore the struggling chords of mighty symphonies

There the figure, calm, concentrated, on its breast the great head bent;—
Stand forever thus, great master! thou thy fittest monument.

Poor in life, by friends deserted, through disease and pain and care,
Bravely, stoutly hast thou striven, never yielding to despair;

High the claims of Art upholding; firm to Freedom; in a crowd,
Where the highest bent as courtiers, speaking manfully and loud.

In thy silent world of deafness, broken by no human word,
Music sang with voice ideal, while thy listening spirit heard,
Tones consoling and prophetic, tones to raise, refine and cheer,
Deathless tones that thou hast garnered to refresh and charm us here.

And for all these riches fineless, all these wondrous gifts of thine,
We have only Fame's dry laurel on thy careworn brow to twine.

We can only say, Great Master, take the homage of our heart;
Be the High Priest in our temple, dedicate to thee and Art.
Stand before us, and enlarge us with thy presence and thy power,
And o'er all Art's depths and shallows light us like a beacon-tower.

In the mighty realm of Music there is but a single speech,
Universal as the world is, that to every heart can reach.
Thou within that realm art monarch, but the humblest vassal there Knows the accents of that language when it calls to war or prayer.

Underneath its world-wide banyan, friends the gathering nations sit;
Red Sioux and dreamy German dance and feast and fight to it.
When the storm of battle rages, and the brassy trumpet blares,
Cheering on the hurried tumult, in the van its meteor flares.

Sings the laurelled song of conquest, o'er the buried comrade walls,
Plays the peaceful pipes of shepherds in the lone Etrurian vales;
Whispers love beneath the lattice, where the honey-suckle clings;
Crowns the bowl and cheers the dancers, and its peace to sorrow brings;—

Nature knows its wondrous magic, always speaks in tune and rhyme;
Doubles in the sea the heaven, echoes on the rocks the chime.
All her forests sway harmonious, all her torrents hiss in song;
And the starry sphere makes music, gladly journeying along.

Thou hast touched its mighty mystery, with a finger as of fire;
Thrilled the heart with rapturous longing, bade the struggling soul aspire;
Through thy daring modulations, mounting up o'er dizzy stairs

Of harmonic change and progress, into high Elysian airs,
Where the wings of angels graze us, and the voices of the spheres

Seem not far, and glad emotions fill the silent eyes with tears.
What a vast, majestic structure thou hast builded out of sound,
With its high peak piercing Heaven, and its deep base underground.

Vague as air, yet firm and real to the spiritual eye,
Seamed with fire its cloudy bastions far away uplifted lie,—
Like those rullen shapes of thunder we behold at close of day,
Piled upon the far horizon, where the jagged lightnings play.

Awful voices, as from Hades, thrill us, growling from its heart:
Sudden splendors blaze from out it, cleaving its black walls apart.

White winged birds dart forth and vanish, singing, as they pass from sight,
Till at last it lifts, and 'neath it lets a blaze of amber light
Where some single star is shining, throbbing like a new born thing,
And the earth, all drenched in splendor, hears its happy voices sing.

Topmost crown of Ancient Athens towered the Phidian Parthenon;
Upon Freedom's robe Forehead, Art, the starry jewel, shone,
Here's yet in our Republic, in the furrows of our toll,
Slowly grows Art's timid blossom 'neath the heavy foot of toll.

Spurn it not—but spare it, nurse it, till it gladden all the land;
Hail to-day this seed of promise, planted by a generous hand—
Our first statue to an artist—nobly given, nobly planned.

Never is a nation finished while it wants the grace of Art—
Use must borrow robes from Beauty, life must rise above the mart.

Faith and love are all ideal, speaking with a music tone—
And without their touch of magic, labor is the Devil's own.
Therefore are we glad to greet thee, master artist, to thy place,
For we need, in all our living, Beauty and ideal grace,
Mostly here, to lift our nation, move its heart and calm its nerves,
And to round life's angled duties to imaginative curves.

Mild the jarring din of traffic, let the Orphic tone of Art
Lull the barking Cerberus in us, soothe the cares that gnaw the heart.

With thy universal language, that our feeble speech transcends,
Wing our thoughts that creep and grovel, come to us when speaking ends,— Bear us into realms ideal, where the cant of common sense
Dins no more its heartless maxims to the jangling of its pence;
Thence down dropped into the Actual, we shall on our garments bear Perfume of an unknown region, beauty of celestial air;

Life shall wear a nobler aspect, joy shall greet us in the street;
Earthy dust of low ambition shall be shaken from our feet.
Evil spirits that torment us, into air shall vanish all,
And the magic-harp of David soothe the haunted heart of Saul.

As of yore the swart Egytians rent the air with choral song,
When Osiris' golden statue triumphing they bore along;
As along the streets of Florence, borne in glad procession, went Cimabue's famed Madonna, praised by voice and instrument,
Let our voices sing thy praises, let our instruments combine,
Till the hall with triumph echo, for the hour and place are thine.

Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

[From the Analytical and Historical Programme of the London Philharmonic Concert, July 11, 1870.]

The history of this most important, most original, and most noble work, refers to periods extending over more than thirty years of the composer's life. Mr. Grove—whose researches on the subject of BEETHOVEN are as wide as their result is interesting—traces, in a letter, of 1793, to Schiller's sister, that the great artist, already then in his twenty-third year, contemplated an extensive setting of the Ode to Joy. Hence, we may assume that the poem was a favorite with the musician in his earliest days, probably that he knew it by heart in childhood, and that the project of rendering anew its ideas in music was a consequence of his being penetrated with the full spirit of the composition. Evidence has not come to light that Beethoven at this time made any progress in the intended work, or indeed began it. Whatever may have happened in the interim, he entered seriously on the long-purposed task about the year 1811-12, when he wrote down some indications of the plan of the work, and even some melodic sketches for the setting of the first words, in a book containing memoranda for the Symphonies in A and in E. These interesting fragments are printed by Thayer, as are also some other drafts of music to the words—different entirely from the finally adopted theme—dating from September, 1822. Meanwhile according to Nottebohm, the Symphony was begun in 1817, and Mr. Cipriani Potter's recollection of having seen some sketches for it, when he was with Beethoven in that year, corroborates the statement. A vote of the Philharmonic Society of November 10, 1822, offered the sum of £50 to the master for the composition of a Symphony; and he seems to have destined the work he had in progress, for the fulfilment of this commission. His letter to Ferdinand Ries (then in London) of April 25, 1823, has this passage: "I am, besides, far from well, owing to my many troubles—weak eyes among others. But do not be uneasy, you shall shortly receive the Symphony; really and truly, my distressing condition is alone to blame for the delay." Writing to the same, September 5, 1823, Beethoven says, "The Copyist to-day at last finished the score of the Symphony; so Kirchhoff and I are only waiting for a favorable opportunity to send it off." From this, it is certain that the composition had, in September, been some time finished, and it is probable that it was completed in the preceding April; the non-production of the work in England until after its performance in Vienna was therefore consequent upon some causes that are not apparent, causes in which the author of the Symphony was not concerned. The Vienna performance took place, May 7, 1824, at a concert given by Beethoven, when the Mass in D was also first produced. It had been long since the artist had personally appeared, or had produced any work in public; it was generally known that he had composed these two extraordinary masterpieces; his always increasing deafness, his bad state of health, and his constant apprehension of pecuniary difficulties, made him ever more and more irritable, and this state of mind led him to suppose himself slighted by the public and even by his friends; the latter, therefore, as much to appease him as to gratify their own earnest interest in the works, sent him a letter, with thirty signatures of the most notable musicians and music lovers in the Austrian capital, requesting him to bring his new music before the world. The concert was given in compliance with this request, but was delayed by many vexations, which, perhaps, were aggravated by Beethoven's susceptible and, at that time, suspicious temper. He himself was present, indicating the times of the movements to Umlauf, the conductor, but unable to hear the music or even the vehement applause it drew from the enthusiastic audience. Madame Sabatier, (then Mlle Ungher), who sang one of the solo parts, repeated, when she was here last season, the too well known story of his sad insensibility to the general demonstration of delight, which could not reach him through his ears. The Symphony was played in London at the Philharmonic Concert of March 21, 1825, when Madame Caradori, Miss Goodhall, Mr. Vaughn, and Mr. Phillips were the singers, and Sir George Smart conducted. In April, 1825, an advertisement inviting subscriptions for the publication of the Symphony appeared in the 'Cæcilia,' a German musical periodical; and, in a far later number of the same, it is announced as one of the publications issued by Messrs. Schott, of Mayence, during the months of April, May and June, 1826; whence it is positive the work was not printed for more than a year after it had been played in London, but yet appeared while the composer was yet alive to supervise its publication. In February, 1826, suffering from most painful fear of real want during his last illness, Beethoven appealed, through Moscheles and Sir George Smart, to the Philharmonic Society, requesting the fulfilment of an offer that had once been made to him, to give a concert for his benefit; avoiding the delay this would have occasioned, the Society immediately voted him the sum of £100, in acknowledging which, on the 18th of March, Beethoven dictated as follows:—"Say to these worthy men, that if God restores me to health, I shall endeavor to prove the reality of my gratitude by my actions. I therefore leave it to the Society to choose what I am to write for them—a Symphony (the tenth) lies fully sketched in my desk, and likewise a new Overture and some other things.

I beg you will deliver the mentioned ninth Symphony to the Society." Eight days after dictating this, the mighty master was no more.

As the choral division of the work is the most novel in purpose, and the least obvious in design, the concise description of its plan may not to some readers be unacceptable. The form in which it is cast is analogous to that of the last movement of the Eroica, being a series of contrapuntal elaborations upon a simple melodious theme; and the surmise is warrantable that the complete artistic success of that earlier great composition prompted the author to have again recourse to the same means, and gave him just reliance on his own power to apply them. What is here, for the first time, styled the Instrumental Introduction, is, like the Tutti of a Concerto, a kind of epitome of what follows from the entry of the voices, and is also a link to connect the Finale with the foregoing three movements. The Presto is a prelude to the long passage for the basses, which is directed to be played selon le caractère d'un Recitativo, mais in Tempo. This quasi recitative is interspersed with short allusions to the first Allegro, the Scherzo, and the Adagio; and these indicate a designed relationship between the feelings expressed in those divisions of the Symphony, and in the last movement. The theme is then given by the unaccompanied basses. This is followed by three Variations—the word is used in its highest sense, as signifying the most skillful and imaginative gloss upon a Cantus Firmus—the first being for the Violoncellos and Violas in unison against an independent melody for the double basses, the second being an intricate piece of four-part counterpoint for all the string instruments, and the third employing the full orchestra. After some extension of the last, the preludial Presto recurs, and introduces the solo voice with a compression of the previous instrumental Recitativo. Then, strictly, the Ode begins. The first stanza is set as a bass solo to the melody for which, as it should seem, Beethoven had been for thirty years in unsuccessful search, when the late fruit richly repaid his patient endurance; the second stanza is set to a comparatively simple, and the third to a more florid variation upon this, both for the four solo voices, and both totally unlike the Variations in the Introduction: the second strain of all these three is repeated by the chorus. In the fourth stanza, the musician seizes on the poet's metaphor, and shows us a glittering array of triumphant heroes returning in all the joy of conquest from a glorious success. The structure of this Variation involves not the notes alone, but the essential spirit of the theme. A solo tenor sings through the march of the military instruments, and is afterwards joined by the male chorus. There follows a long passage of fugal character, without voices, whose subject is an off-shoot of the previous Variation, which is made the groundwork of a double counterpoint. Then the first stanza recurs, the melody being assigned in simple notes to the chorus, and the instruments having a florid counterpoint against it, which gives it an effect as vigorous as brilliant. The allusion to the Deity in the following stanza, gives occasion for change of key measure and tempo, and for the happy contrast of the ecclesiastical style. The same purpose is continued in the setting of the second quatrain of the same stanza, with still greater solemnity of manner and even more devotional character. The first stanza is then again resumed, and the theme set to it is wrought together with that to which the words "O ye millions, I embrace ye," are adapted. Thenceforward to the end, through the several changes of tempo, no new ideas are presented, but those which already have been heard are developed with such variety as makes the peroration of this grand discourse the most exciting and impressive portion of the whole, and exalts the joyous expression of the piece to true sublimity.

Beethoven's Choral Fantasia.

This piece was first heard at the author's concert in Vienna, December 22, 1808, when he himself sustained the pianoforte part. It was thus described:—"Fantasia on the Pianoforte, which concludes with the gradual entrance of the whole orchestra, and at last of the full chorus, as Finale." The Fantasia was first printed in July, 1811. Sketches for the composition are found in the same book with those for the Symphony in C minor and for the Quartets, Op. 18, which Thayer refers to the year 1800. The chief theme of the Fantasia belongs, however, to a yet earlier period. It constitutes one movement of a song called "Sighs of an unloved one," set to a poem by Bürger, and the words apporportioned to it begin thus:

"Wüsst' ich, wüsst' ich dass du mich
lieb und werth ein Bleichen hieltest."

This was composed in or near 1795, while Beethoven was studying under Albrechtsberger.

One may amplify, but cannot invalidate, the composer's original description of the Fantasia. The German acceptance of the title should be taken into account, as signifying an improvisation, or, if not literally this, the appropriating to written composition of such freedoms of the fantasy as would necessarily characterize an extemporaneous performance. Truly of this nature is the long prelude for the pianoforte alone, in which the rhythmical interruptions, the startling changes of key, and the indecision of theme, are tokens of unpremeditation; while the coherence of the whole and its constant climax to a purposed point, show the beautiful organization of a mind that was orderly and symmetrical in its moments of utmost wildness. What is styled the Finale begins where the basses enter with a brief but distinct subject. The phrases of this are interspersed with pianoforte passages of the same free character as the foregoing; but other orchestral instruments successively appear as if to curb the fitful fancy of the extemporist, and call it within formal restrictions. Thus is introduced the Allegretto. Of this, the pianoforte has the simple theme. A variation for the flute follows; then one for the oboes; then a third for the clarionets and bassoon; and the fourth variation employs the string instruments. An extension of this introduces the rest of the orchestra, and the pianoforte presently re-appears with new matter that is a consequence but not a part of the theme. The continuity of this portion of the piece excellently relieves the rhythmical squareness of the Air and of the Variations; but this is again welcome when, first the solo voices, and afterwards the chorus take up the theme. Finally, the noble Coda shows the greatest strength of the master, and here we find him seizing on every word that admits of particular expression, as an occasion to enforce and vary his musical effect—for instance, the striking use of the chord of E flat on the word "pow'r" appears to be the point whence radiates all the brightness of the conclusion.

The original poem is by Christian Kuffner.

The following new translation is by Mrs. Macfarren.

Soft and sweet, through ether winging,
Sound the harmonies of life;
Their immortal flowers springing
Where the soul is free from strife.

Peace and joy are sweetly blended,
Like the waves' alternate play;
What for mastery contended,
Learns to yield and to obey.

When on music's mighty pinion
Souls of men to Heaven rise,
Then doth vanish earth's dominion,
Man is native to the skies.

Calm without, and joy within us,
Is the bliss for which we long;
If of art the magic win us,
Joy and calm are turned to song.

With its tide of joy unbroken,
Music's flood our life surrounds;
What a master-mind hath spoken
Through eternity resounds.

Oh! receive, ye joy-invited,
All its blessings without guile;
When to love is pow'r united,
Then the gods approving smile.

The Four Overtures to "Fidelio."

[Mr. G. Grove (in the London Musical World) translates as follows from the "Beethoveniana" of Herr Nottebohm.]

It is usually believed that the Overture published as Beethoven's Opus 138 was written in the year 1805, and formed the first in the series of the "Overtures to Leonora." This, however, is irreconcilable with certain facts which I will endeavor to lay before the reader.

It will be necessary, in the first place, to examine the materials upon which the ordinary belief in this matter is based.

No autograph score of the Overture is known to exist. All that we at present possess is an ancient MS. copy of the score and orchestral parts, both of which have been examined and corrected by Beethoven himself. There is no note on either of the date of the composition, but the first violin part bears the following title:—

Overture in C
Charakteristisch
Overture
Violino I mo

The words "Overture" and "Violino I mo" are by the copyist. The others "in C," "Charakteristisch Overture," have been afterwards added by Beethoven. Both score and parts were purchased by Tobias Haslinger, at the sale of Beethoven's effects in November, 1827, and are at present in the possession of the firm of Haslinger, at Vienna. The Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for 1828 (p. 111) contains a statement to the effect that Haslinger had bought a packet labelled "Dances and Marches, &c.," at some absurdly low price, and that the packet was found to contain the score and parts of an unknown Grand Characteristic Overture, which, according to the recollections of Schuppanzigh, had been tried over by the composer,—as, indeed, was evident from its containing his own corrections in red pencil. Early in 1828 Haslinger announced the approaching appearance of the work in the Münchener Musikzeitung as "Grosse charakteristische Overture, 138 werk," a title which agrees in all essential respects with Beethoven's own inscription already quoted. The work, however, as we shall see, eventually appeared under another title.

The performance of the Overture after its discovery was at a Concert of Bernhard Romberg's at Vienna, on Feb. 7th, 1828, the report of which in the Leipziger Allgemeine Musik Zeitung for 1828 (p. 225), speaks of the "great interest excited by Beethoven's last Overture, in MS., from his Remains." The same thing is repeated in the Vienna Theater Zeitung for 1828 (pages 68 and 82), while in the Sammler for Feb. 28th, 1828, we find: "At this Concert an Overture was given, from Beethoven's Remains, a work which, to judge from its quiet character, belongs to his early period." The second performance took place on the 13th of the following March at one of the Concerts Spirituels, in the programme of which it is announced as "Grosse Charakteristische Overture von Beethoven (MS.)." Other reports may be found in the Leipziger Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, 1828 (p. 296); the Berlin Musik Zeitung, 1828 (p. 215); and the Vienna Theater Zeitung, 1828 (p. 151).

It is evident from the foregoing that up to March 1828 nothing was known of the date at which the Overture was composed; nor is anything said to lead to the conclusion that it was recognized as belonging to Leonora. It was published, however, in the year 1832 or 1833, by Haslinger, under the title, "Overture in C, componirt im Jahr 1805 zur Oper Leonore," &c., and in the first edition of Schindler's Biography, (1840) p. 58, (compare the 3rd edition i. 127, ii. 42), it is mentioned as the first of the four Overtures to Leonore, and as therefore composed before the so-called "No. 2," which was played when the Opera was first put on the boards, in 1805. With these notices, in so far as they give 1805 for the date of composition, all later statements agree; and they evidently form the foundation of the belief mentioned at the outset of these remarks.

I have, now, however, to mention a fact which has made its appearance during my examination of a large collection of Beethoven's Sketches, and is in direct opposition to the ordinary assumption.

On the upper side of a leaf of Sketches are found fragments belonging to the second and third movements of the C Minor Symphony.

Turning over the leaf we find the top staves of the second page occupied with the following passage from the transition to the Finale of the same Symphony:—(we omit quotation)

And this again is immediately followed by a page belonging to the Overture, Op. 138:—(quotation).

From this it is evident that the Sketches for the Overture were made later than those for the Symphony.

We turn now to a collection of Sketches, consisting of four consecutive sheets, containing 16 pages, and belonging to the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde" of Vienna. On the first page we find, amongst others, the following, belonging to the C Minor Symphony:—(quotation).

On the second page are Sketches for the Overture, extending connectedly through 12 pages, of which the following quotations will give an idea:—

These again are followed by a Sketch for the first movement of the Violoncello Sonata, Op. 69. (quotation).

From the contents and relative positions of the above quotations, it is evident that the Overture was begun when the C Minor Symphony was near its close, and that it was completely sketched when the Violoncello Sonata was first taken in hand.

The time at which the Overture was commenced would be more exactly ascertainable if we knew when the Symphony was either finished or near its completion. On this point, however, we have as yet no exact information. The original MS. does not exhibit any date. Schindler's first edition (p. 69) states that the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Symphonies were written in 1806, 7, and 8; but the third edition says that the C Minor was written at Heiligenstadt, where Beethoven was residing in the year 1808. Little reliance, however, can be placed on Schindler's statements. Thayer (Chron. Verzeichnisse, p. 74) also gives 1808 as the date of composition, but with a note of interrogation. The list appended to the contract with Clementi, and dated the 20th of April, 1807, does not mention the Symphony at all, from which it is fair to infer that it was not at that time ready. The earliest date on which we can absolutely rely is the 22nd December, 1808, the day of the first performance of the Symphony; and this, therefore, limits the period of composition on one side. On the other side there are the following limitations. We can safely say that the Fifth Symphony was composed after the Fourth. Now, we know from the autograph that the Fourth was composed in 1806. It is, therefore, plain that neither the Fifth Symphony nor the Overture can have been written earlier than 1806, 7, or 8. But if the contract with Clementi may be taken as evidence, we can come still closer, and say that both Symphony and overture were composed sometime between April 1807, and December 1808.

The Violoncello Sonata, being written after the Overture, is of no assistance in the enquiry. Although published in 1809, it was most probably ready in January, 1808, if not sooner.

His arguments already drawn from the sketches are corroborated in other quarters. In the Journal des Luxus und der Moden of January, 1808, is the following communication from Vienna:—"I have much pleasure in informing you that Beethoven has just finished a Mass, which is to be executed at Prince Esterhazy's on the Festival of the Virgin. Fidelio will very shortly be brought out in Prague, with a new Overture. The Fourth Symphony is in the press," &c., &c. The Mass referred to is that in C, Opus 86, which was sung for the first time at Eisenstadt on the 13th of September, 1807; but which was not complete in the preceding July, as may be seen from the letters communicated by Mr. Pohl to the Grenzboten, 1808, No. 46. It follows, therefore, that the letter just quoted must have been written between July and the beginning of September. That by the "new Overture" is meant that in C major "Opus 138," is evident from the following considerations. Seyfried, in the appendix to his book of Beethoven Studies, published in 1832, after speaking of the success of Fidelio in 1806, says—"For the Prague Theatre Beethoven wrote a new and less difficult Overture, which Haslinger purchased at the auction, and will probably publish before long"—to which remark Haslinger adds—"The Overture is already engraved in score and parts, and will be published in the course of this year (1832) in various arrangements."

The story is now perfectly clear. The German opera in Prague was to have opened in the beginning of May, with Fidelio or (Leonora), for which Beethoven was to write a short and easy Overture, in place of the long and difficult one with which his opera had been given in Vienna the year before; and it is this Overture that was published as Opus 138. Being thus composed in the year 1807, it is not the first, but the third of the Leonora overtures; and that hitherto known as No. 2 (1805) is the first, and No. 3 (1806) the second. The fourth in E major remains in its old position, although as we shall presently see, it was nearly being No. 5.

It is difficult to understand how Haslinger, being aware, as he was, of Seyfried's statement, should, on the title page of his edition have named 1805 as the year of the composition of the Overture. One way, however, there is of accounting for this. At the time the Overture was printed only two overtures to Leonora were known. Thus in the Vienna Allgemeine Musikalische Anzeiger of March 17th, 1831 (Haslinger's own publication) we read—"At the third Concert Spirituel, on the 10th inst., Beethoven's rarely-performed overture to Leonora (afterwards called Fidelio) was played. Beethoven is known to have superseded this work by another, as being too long for dramatic effect, and too hard for an ordinary orchestra." The Vienna Theaterzeitung for 1831 speaks at page 135 of the same concert, and praises the execution of the concluding presto of the overture—"a piece in which it is hard indeed to make the violins go well," &c. The Allgemeine musik Anzeiger of April 21st, 1831, says—"We have reason to believe that at the approaching performance of Fidelio at the Court Theatre the two Overtures will be given alternately;" and on the 12th of April, 1832, "at the performance of Fidelio for Madame Fischer-Achten's benefit—the Overture was that originally composed for the opera, but afterwards laid aside on account of its immense difficulty." There can be no doubt that the two Overtures mentioned in these extracts are the great one in C major of 1806, and the fourth in E major of 1814. Now it must have been known that Beethoven wrote more than two Leonora overtures, and that the opera was produced in 1805 with a different overture to that played at its reappearance in 1806. But still, at that time, very little can have been known of the 1805 overture (the actual first), beyond its bare existence, or indeed until its performance at Leipzig in 1840 and its publication in 1842 as "No. 2." And as the occurrence of the passage from Florestan's air in the overture Opus 138 fixed it as one of the Leonora overtures, so the assumption was easy that it was the 1805 one, and in this way the addition of that date to the title of Haslinger's edition may be explained.

Of the existence of the Prague overture Schindler had no knowledge; he has assumed Haslinger's date as correct, and, as far as I know, he was the first to arrange the four overtures in the chronological order in which they are at present generally accepted; but it must not be overlooked that neither he nor Haslinger has given us anything in confirmation of the assumed date of Opus 138, and all efforts have hitherto proved unavailing to discover its source, or to find any authority which should in any way corroborate its accuracy. In fact the date is one which never has been, nor can be sustained, and which rests entirely upon itself.

Schindler's farther statement has anything but a probable sound. His words (i. 127, ii. 42 and 43) are as follows:—"The Overture was hardly finished before Beethoven's confidence began to be shaken in it. His friends were of the same opinion. A rehearsal with a small orchestra was arranged at Prince Lichnowsky's, at which the work, as a whole, was found unsuitable for a prelude to the opera. Neither in ideas, style, or character, did it suit the taste of the tribunal, and it was therefore laid aside." One cannot resist asking who it was that constituted this musical tribunal to which Beethoven submitted himself; and, indeed, who ever heard of his submitting himself to such judgment? The utmost that can be true in the whole history is that the overture was rehearsed at Prince Lichnowsky's, and that Beethoven himself discovered imperfections in it and decided on altering them; and this falls in with other considerations which shall be mentioned, and which it is hardly necessary to say will (like the foregoing) be in direct opposition to Schindler's statements.

In the MS. copy of the Overture mentioned at the outset of these remarks, there are many alterations in Beethoven's hand, made at a later date, probably in the year 1814, when he undertook the final revision of his opera. Some of these alterations are only indicated and not thoroughly carried out, and in every case the original reading is legible. The appearance of the MS. shows conclusively that it cannot have been a copy made for the press or considered as complete for publication, a fact directly at variance with Schindler's assertion (ii. 42), that Beethoven in the year 1823 was meditating the immediate publication of the Overture "Op. 138," which had been in the hands of Steiner & Co. for several years—an assertion which is as incorrect as another of his statements (i. 127), that the firm of Steiner & Co. had already (that is to say, in 1805) acquired the copyright of the Overture, Steiner's firm not having come into existence until the year 1815. But to proceed. Some of the alterations can be read in two ways, and therefore would only puzzle the engraver and lead to mistakes in the publication. In the editions of Haslinger and Breitkopf all the intelligible and available alterations have been included.*

But this was not all. When he was preparing the opera for its third appearance, in 1814, he took the Overture in hand and entirely remodelled it. The principal themes were retained, but the key was changed into E major. That in this form it was intended for Fidelio there can be no manner of doubt; for, in the sketches, the chief themes of the Overture are intermixed with passages from Florestan's air at the beginning of the second act.

Beethoven, however, did not carry these intentions into practice, but wrote instead the well known Overture in E major. Had he done so we should probably have had five overtures to Leonora, and the Overture of 1807 would have been regarded as the forerunner of a fourth in 1814, just as that of 1805 (the real No. 1) is now regarded as the parent of that of 1806. It seems probable that when Beethoven first thought of an entire revision of the overture Op. 138 he put it before him in its original form and key, made a few alterations, and added the title "Characteristic Overture." The question now remains. If, according to the ordinary belief, the Overture Op. 138 was composed in 1805 and was the actual first of the Leonora overtures, is it explicable, is it possible to believe that, at the final revision of his opera, in the year 1814, he should have gone back to a work from which he was separated by so enormous a gap as the two great Overtures of C major?

*It may be interesting here to draw attention to the principal of these corrections in the Introduction, bars 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, which Beethoven has altered and shortened by a whole bar.

A Musical Tour in North Germany.

BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.—No. 6.

(From the London Choir.)

In the evening I followed the usual custom of the musical people of Dresden, and went to the Opera-house, a huge temporary wooden building, capable of seating three thousand persons, erected shortly after the lamentable fire at the late splendid Opera-house, which was totally destroyed. The prices of admission varied from 3s. 6d. to 9d., the house being so constructed that every one could both hear and see well. I had a front stall in the parquette, immediately in front of the stage and orchestra, and I was delighted to find on receiving a programme that my long wished for opportunity of hearing one of Wagner's most popular operas in Germany was now to be gratified. We were to have the "Meister-singer," and it was certainly put upon the stage and performed most effectively. The orchestra consisted of about sixty performers, directed by that able musician and composer Dr. Julius Rietz, Mendelsohn's friend. Whether from the intense heat and the want of proper ventilation in the building, or from the want of repose, variety and relief in the music, I was quite overcome at the end of the first act, and was compelled to return to my hotel—perhaps a wiser, but certainly a sadder man. Undoubtedly Wagner's instrumentation is the work of a master and not for one moment does he apparently allow the performers to indulge in the luxury of a few bars rest. Nearly every instrument in the orchestra seemed to have an obligato part, and all were playing at one and the same time. It was impossible to catch more than the ghost or fragment of a tune. No sooner did the ear find a snatch of pretty melody when it instantly gave place to another equally brief; every conceivable device seemed to be employed to render every subject peculiar and fragmentary, and yet undoubtedly many of the dramatic situations were powerful and effective. Especially interesting was the opening portion of the opera at the conclusion of the singular and overwrought overture. Here the scene in the church, the groupings, and never ceasing action of two or three score of people on the stage, undoubtedly excite lively interest, and seemed to be highly and fully appreciated by the composer's numerous admirers, who were present in full force, and some of whom did their best to impress upon my mind the sublime superiority of this and other Wagnerian effusions over the masterpieces of those great musicians whom either my education or my prejudices had taught me to esteem the highest. I did not hear very much of Wagner's music, but what I did hear I can conscientiously say I did not like. Richard Wagner's music may possibly be worthy of association, as his admirers affirm, with the greatest operatic inspirations of Gluck, Mozart, Weber, Rossini and Meyerbeer; it may be possessed of many of the highest attributes of the art; it may, and does undoubtedly interest a large section of his countrymen; it may in its association with the dramatic books of his own construction produce novel and startling effects; but it will never, in my humble opinion, become popular with those who love music for music's sake, and believe that melody, form and rhythm, and clearness of design are essential elements in all good and beautiful music. The works of the great masters, which defy the inroads of time, possess the two essentials of life and greatness, beauty and truth; beauty as evidenced in its inspired tone and loveliness; truth in conforming to the canons of art and to those rules of composition by which the man of genius avails himself of scholarship, to cement and consolidate his ideas. It would seem that Wagner, in his late productions, has aimed too much at mystification, or perhaps he regards it as originality. And yet he has produced pleasing and intelligible music. His opera, "The Flying Dutchman," composed thirty years ago, and produced with considerable success in London this year, is not only natural and flowing in its music, but is sufficiently interesting and original to warrant the assertion that, had this composer followed the bent of his early inclination and genius, he would have brought the whole musical world to acknowledge that he was the great musical apostle his followers and admirers now claim him to be—a claim to which, I venture to think, any but prejudiced people will deny his right.

The day following I visited the Royal Porcelain Stores, and also took the welcome opportunity of seeing the magnificent collection of paintings in the famous and extensive Gallery, where are a number of representations of the interiors of churches by Peter Neuf, which will well repay careful study—and notably a remarkable effort of Ghering's, painted in the year 1665, in which there appears a large organ, elevated on a screen over two arches; but all this has been so frequently described elsewhere, that any further account is unnecessary. In the evening, after having been present at one of those sumptuous dinners for which the large hotels in Dresden are so celebrated, I repaired to the charming Belvedere Gardens on the banks of the Elbe, and there listened to the usual excellent band in the company of hundreds of persons enjoying themselves in a similar tranquil way, and apparently intensely appreciative of the pleasant strains. The next morning (Tuesday) I proceeded to the Hofkirche and kept my appointment with its well-known organist, Herr Gustav Merkel, whom I found waiting for me. He began at once to show the specialties and powers of the noble instrument which, built by Silbermann in 1754, has three manuals and a pedal organ of eight stops; the following being its disposition:—

No organ I heard in Germany pleased me better than this: it has a ringing quality of tone of a rich and powerful character, and, were the reeds equal to the flue work, the instrument would, for its size, be quite unsurpassed. As with previous German organists, Herr Merkel politely requested me first to try the organ, which I did by playing some English compositions, that appeared greatly to interest him; and afterwards he performed in his own admirable style Bach's Passacaglia in C minor, one of Schumann's Fugues on the name of Bach, and some of his own charming compositions. The reverberation and echo in this church, when empty, are great indeed, greater than I have heard in our English Cathedrals and large public buildings, and I need scarcely add that this fact considerably militated against the clear and distinct hearing of the music. I ought to mention that the case which contains the organ is one of immense size, excellent design, and most richly ornamented. Most of the 16ft. metal pipes are placed in front and divided into five compartments.

The next day, in accordance with an invitation, I paid a visit to Dr. Julius Rietz, when we discussed at length musical matters in general, but more particularly the redoubtable Richard Wagner, as well as organ-music, German and English. As with other Germans, I found him also quite unacquainted with any compositions for the king of instruments by Englishmen, and I felt it therefore a pleasure to be able to enlighten this able musician by going through with him not only many excellent works written for the organ, but also several cantatas, anthems, &c., by some of our first composers. On the whole, he seemed somewhat surprised and much gratified by their recital. I was highly pleased to receive from Dr. Rietz a copy of a new and exquisite duet which he had just written for organ and violin, and which, since my return to England, I have frequently introduced (such favor has it earned) at my own organ concerts in Leeds. The pleasure of my visit to this most amiable musician was further enhanced by a promise from him to send me a contribution for my organ book.

On the evening of the same day, after having discovered and supplied myself with many new musical publications of much interest and beauty, I left Dresden for Magdeburg. During the journey a singular incident occurred, which showed unmistakably how well the musical education of the young is cared for in Germany.

At one of the stations (Oschatz) where we stopped for refreshments, a number of boys (probably twenty) returning from school, were met by their companions and also by several young girls, whose joy at returning home was evidenced in their beaming, happy countenances. The whole party quickly formed into a procession, and, marching off two abreast with military precision, headed by the biggest boy, who played a large accordion, sang with excellent time and accent to appropriate words a pretty and simple two-part song.

I reached Magdeburg in the middle of the night, and early on the following morning called upon Dr. Ritter, the organist of the Cathedral, to whom I had a letter of introduction, but to my great disappointment found that he had left home only the day previous for his usual fortnight's holiday, and that the immense Cathedral organ which I had travelled nearly 200 miles to hear, would not and could not, as my informant told me, be played during the doctor's absence. I had, therefore, to content myself with an inspection of the Cathedral, in which are many beautiful objects of art, the marble pulpit especially claiming attention, and with eliciting such information of the organ as the attendants of the Cathedral could afford me. The instrument which now stands in the church was built under the direction of Dr. Ritter by N. Renke, of Hanssendorf, near Quedlinburg, at a cost of 7000 thalers. It has four manuals, eighty-one registers, and 5256 pipes, most of the metal pipes being made of almost pure tin; it has also the advantage of the pneumatic lever, and other modern inventions for facilitating performance. On leaving the Cathedral, which I did with a deep sigh of disappointment, having travelled so far for such small results, I encountered several troops of artillery just proceeding from the great fortress of Magdeburg, and who have been since, I understand, actively engaged in the thick of the war. I was now anxious to return to my friends at Hamburg, for which hospitable city I left at 11:30 a. m., arriving there safely at 5:10 p. m.

Education in Art.

We must abandon the idea that art is a device of leisure and luxury, a meretricious addition, which the palled appetite of self-indulgence and superfluous wealth makes to its weary stock of the merely useful and the necessary. It is man's inmost dream and longing for perfection, striving to realize itself in external forms. Oh, what hidden poetry there is in all souls! what latent wealth of sentiment, what sensibility to beauty, what yearning for harmony and fine effects of tones and chords in color and tune! Who does not see the secret evidence of an inexhaustible capacity for the enjoyment and use of beauty in color and form, in every lovely woman's dress, however humble,—the twist and fold of her hair, the plaits in her bodice, the sweep and set of her skirts, the neatness and finish of her simplest attire? And what American home—ay, cabin—has not some shrine of taste, even though it were only the white curtains in the spare room, the few pictures, perhaps cut from the newspaper, over the daughter's chest of drawers, or the posy stuck in a broken bottle upon the mantle piece? . . . We commend this example, then, to our village circles. Three times in the year, at least, have a series of tableaux in your town hall. Let all the people come together. Make the occasion one of charity. Let it build up, now this, now that, religious or philanthropic cause. Let all join to aid the Congregational, the Episcopal, the Unitarian or Universalist Society, which ever happens to be the beneficiary for the day. Mutual consideration and common charity will thus be promoted; above all, taste and beauty will creep into the community. Worship will catch unexpected inspiration; home will grow more artistic and beautiful; sparks of genius will be struck out of many cold-seeming breasts; old people will appear in new characters; many prejudices will be softened; sectarian rancor will subside; and the wealth and richness of humanity will come out of what seemed monotonous and unpromising spheres. Dull and vulgar life will put on a little bravery and ornament; the taste for pictures will grow; the better art journals will be taken; more attention given to domestic and church music; a finer sense of color and form in nature be developed; and the sacred and divine mission of art be sped on its way, in a country now so bare of its refining influences, yet so ready to carry it, finally, to a pitch never before realized in religion or common life.—Old and New.

WHY OUR ART IS POOR. The Gothic cathedrals were built when the builder and the priest and the people were overpowered by their faith. Love and fear laid every stone. The Madonnas of Raphael and Titian were made to be worshipped. Tragedy was instituted for the like purpose, and the miracles of music all sprang out of some genuine enthusiasm, and never out of dilettanteism and holidays. Now they languish because their purpose is merely exhibition. Who cares, who knows what works of art our government have ordered to be made for the capitol? They are a mere flourish to please the eye of persons who have associations with books and galleries. But in Greece, the Demos of Athens divided into political factions upon the merits of Phidias.

In this country, at this time, other interests than religion and patriotism are predominant, and the arts, the daughters of enthusiasm, do not flourish. The genuine offspring of our ruling passions we behold. Popular institutions, the school, the reading-room, the telegraph, the post-office, the exchange, the insurance company, and the immense harvest of economical inventions are the fruit of the equality and the boundless liberty of lucrative callings. These are superficial wants; and their fruits are the superficial institutions. But as far as they accelerate the end of political freedom and national education, they are preparing the soil of man for fairer flowers and fruits in another age. For beauty, truth and goodness are not obsolete; they spring eternal in the breast of man; they are indigenous in Massachusetts as in Tuscany or the isles of Greece. And that Eternal Spirit whose triple face they are, moulds from them forever, for his immortal child, images to remind him of the Infinite and Fair.—Emerson.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, DEC. 7.—Since my last letter quite a number of more or less important events have occupied our musical attention. There is doubt whether the concerts of the Chicago Quintette Society will be carried through the season, they were given at so great a loss. This, however, was partly owing to bad management. The advertising and other expenses were made too great. Of concert troupes we have had three or four. The Lefranc concerts were very poorly attended. Miss Kellogg had a small house, yet larger than Lefranc. The Barnabee troupe came nearest being what it purported. Mrs. H. M. Smith was greatly admired for her simple and unaffected way of singing. Arbuckle's melody playing has never been surpassed here. Barnabee himself, of course, was the trump card—if you know what that means. In the West everybody is supposed to know the mysteries of Euchre, Draw Poker, and other similar games of genius.

Miss Adelaide Phillips came here for two concerts last week. She employed a small orchestra led by Mr. Grosscurth, a very good but terribly ungraceful conductor. The accompaniments were fairly done (much better than what I hear of Maretzek's performances for Nilsson), but the oboes and clarinets were rough enough. The programmes did not strike me as interesting, though I have been assured by members of the troupe that they were excellent. Miss Phillips sang Handel's noble old melody "Lascia ch' io pianga," as she alone can sing it, and "Una voce poco fa," and some lighter things among which "Comin' thro' the rye." In this latter she puts in a run near the end that almost spoils the song for me. The entire artistic interest of the concert centred in Miss Phillips, and, as she confined herself to one good song in each programme, it was no wonder the public gave her hardly a larger house than it had already given Kellogg. One Sunday, however, she and Lévy were engaged to sing at Unity Church at the regular Organ Concert, the price of which was raised to fifty cents, for the benefit of the Sabbath School. The house was crowded, nearly seven hundred dollars being taken. The success was complete. Miss Phillips sang in her best method Costa's "I dreamt I was in heaven," and "Pieta" from the Prophete. The first was the grandest artistic triumph that our concert-rooms have witnessed for many years. From all quarters I learn that the impression was most profound. There is one point in Miss Phillips' singing that I must make bold to criticize, and that is the noise of her aspirations. I do not think it at all necessary that the breathing should be audible throughout a large hall, as in this case, and I speak of it because it is the one blemish on what else were well-nigh perfect. I ought to have particularly referred to Miss Phillips' singing in "Una voce poco fa," which was the most finished piece of vocalism ever heard here, as many say. Not having been here so long, I cannot say. The price of concerts must be lowered or small houses will always ensue. People will not pay opera prices for one or two good songs.

In this Sunday Concert Mr. Creswold played the Andante con moto from Mendelssohn's A minor symphony, Monastery Bells, and the Overture to Tuncredi. This gentleman is one of the most pleasing popular organists in the country, having a very discriminative taste for orchestral effects. In my description of his technique as being "showy but superficial," I was perhaps rather sweeping, and as I have been repeatedly called to account for it, I now rise to explain. By a showy technique I mean command enough of the organ to appear to play almost everything, and facility in stop-work enough to make rapid and effective changes. By "superficial" I mean to say that the pedal playing is not phrased, the man-uals in intricate passages are not always clear, and that all light un-organ-like music is better performed than that which is proper to the instrument. Nevertheless this gentleman is really an acquisition to our city, and as a popular player his failings lean to virtue's side.

Mr. Dudley Buck's recitals continue. I append programmes:

Fourth.
Sonata in D minor, Op. 15.....J. A. Van Eyken.
Andante, from the "Sonata Pastorale," Op. 28.....Beethoven.
Theme, Variations and Finale in A flat.....Thiele.
Pictures from the Orient, Op. 68, No. II.....Schumann.
Transcription, from the Piano Duets.....Weber.
Prelude and Fugue, on the name Bach.....J. S. Bach.
Overture to Stradella.....Flotow.

Fifth.
a. Grand Prelude in E minor.....Bach.
b. Study, No. 6, in Canon Form.....Schumann.
Concerto, No. 2, in B flat.....Handel.
Rondo Grazioso.....Spohr.
Concert Fantasia, on the Prayer from "Der Freischütz," F. Lux.
Spring Song and Romance, Op. 60.....Schumann.
Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai.
Adagio, Op. 35.....G. Merkel.
*Organist to the King of Saxony.

Of the difficulty of some of these selections I need not inform eastern organists. The audiences at these recitals are of the most select. I am glad to say that the series is a complete financial success. Every single one of these pieces was performed with great finish, and the most perfect neatness, combined with an intelligent artistic feeling.

On the 16th and 17th we have a Beethoven Festival by the Concordia Society. The Choral Symphony will be given, and other great works. Fidelio will be given in February. Yours,

DER FREYSCHUETZ.

German Music in Italy.

FLORENCE, NOV. 26, 1870. Florence has been called the capital of bad music, and the title is, alas, too well merited. From time to time there is a convulsive, spasmodic effort to introduce classical music. The effort fails and hope dies. A quartet of stringed instruments give several concerts in Lent, and manage to pay expenses; and last spring HANS VON BUELOW gave us two fine orchestral concerts with a good substantial programme. This same great performer is still here. He has ceased to dispute the position of first German pianist with Rubinstein and Tausig in his own country, and has made Florence his home for the present. He is certainly one of the finest living pianists. Perhaps he is not so grand in very difficult octave passages as Tausig, nor has he as much sentiment as Rubinstein; but with an exquisite delicacy of touch he combines a wonderful power of understanding and translating music. He brings out that part of music which has been produced by brain-work, rather than that part which has come purely from the heart. For this reason he is eminently fitted to perform the works of BEETHOVEN, and during this month he has given us three concerts devoted exclusively to that composer. On the first evening he gave his early productions—none later than 1801,—consisting of a piano solo:

"Sonata quasi fantasia, Op. 27, No. 1." Duets: piano and violin, and piano and violoncello; and a trio of piano, violin and violoncello. The second evening was devoted to the second period of Beethoven's development, ending about 1808; and the third evening gave us works composed between that date and 1821. The opportunity of studying the great prince of composers was most admirable, the execution could not be surpassed; the position of the concert hall was convenient to all; and the price of tickets was reasonable. What was the result? Barely two hundred people were present! Russians, Germans, English and Americans formed the audience. Italians were sprinkled in here and there, and the few who did come disturbed the rest by talking, for "tis their nature to."

Let us therefore take this example, added to many others, as a proof that the Italians as a nation do not love classical music, and why? Principally, I think, for two reasons, the first of which is habit. Their ears are accustomed to melodies, and not to carefully studied harmonies. It is not the fashion to like harmonies. An Aria is what every young lady is expected to warble; and an effective, showy waltz is the most elaborate allowable parlor piece. If, on the contrary, classical music should become fashionable, very many would necessarily be fascinated by its intrinsic merits and cultivate the taste for it; but even then it would gain ground but slowly on Italian soil. Secondly, it cannot grow in the peculiar atmosphere of Italian society. The character of the people is exactly the opposite of its character. They decidedly object to depth; not to seriousness, but to excessive solidity. Their diet is not solid. Their wines are light. Their religion is not a severe one. Their exercise is always gentle. The rain in Italy never seems very wet nor fire very hot. The only thing that seems to be very intense is solar heat, and that affects their whole being. Their conversation is sun-shiny, but seldom profound. They consider life in general as rather a sun-shiny affair; and their beau-ideal seems to be to bask peacefully in the sun-shine whenever there is any to bask in. All this is evidently opposed to that patient, reflective, metaphysical German nature, of which classical music is the offspring. Such music, being the result of careful and profound human thought and imbued with sentiment, requires evidently close attention and concentration for its perfect appreciation, besides a certain musical education on the part of the listener. No thought is worth much if its full import is evident at its first expression, and no music is worth much that does not require study and that does not produce new impressions at each repetition. Beethoven's music is eminently of this class. The Italians are certainly capable of understanding it, as far as mental power goes, but it must necessarily be distasteful to them. As one of them said to me: "When I want to study, I take up my geometry; when I seek entertainment, let me have some pleasant light music of Douizetti or Bellini, and none of the idiomatic, problematic and fanatic enigmas of Wagner and the other Teutons."

Finally, let us remark, that all things act reciprocally. If the Italians reject good, nutritious music, they must in turn be influenced by that inferior article which their musical nature lives upon; and we Americans, who are not yet mature as a nation, but still in process of formation, may take a lesson from these happy Southerners. We may lay it down as a law, that every successful effort to cultivate the American taste for classical music is a help toward making the national mind thoughtful and elevated.

The New Opera, "Gulnara."

BY SIG. MAESTRO LIBANI.

FLORENCE, NOV. 10, 1870.—The production of music in Italy, like its vegetation, is spontaneous and abundant. Naples will soon be put down in the school geographies as "a city of 700,000 inhabitants, etc." Its chief products being macaroni and composers; the difference being that the macaroni is excellent and the composers otherwise. Petrella, however, has real merit and a good style, although he is a Neapolitan. But the author of "Gulnara" is a Roman, and this is his first opera. He is a man about thirty-five, of a light build, figure, delicate complexion, very black hair and eyes, and an unusually pleasant voice. He has studied at Rome and published numerous minor pieces.

Sig. Libani paid five thousand francs to have his opera put on the stage, besides one-half of the expenses of new costumes, which adds another thousand, and other incidental expenses, such as music copying, etc. The conditions are as usual in Italy. If the opera fails, Sig. Libani loses 6,500 francs. If it is a success, the director of the opera company pays a certain per cent. of the nett receipts, and the composer is very likely to sell his opera to some music publisher.

The first representation was on Nov. 9th, at the Pagliano, the largest opera house in Florence. The plot is laid in Germany in the 12th century. Job (barytone) is the usurper of his brother's throne, and covets Regina for his bride. Regina (soprano) loves Oberto, a noble of the court. Gulnara (contralto) is a former courtesan of Frederick Barbarossa, and is full of vengeance against the usurping brother Job. Regina is very ill and Oberto swears to do anything that Gulnara may ask of him if she will cure Regina by a secret process known only to herself, and the compact is made. Frederick Barbarossa returns as a pilgrim and learns of Gulnara's plans of vengeance. Regina appears ready for the marriage ceremony. Job steps in and challenges Oberto. Frederick, however, also appears, stops the duel, and banishes Job. In the fourth and last act, Job is discovered on the seashore. Gulnara brings Oberto to the spot and swears to put an end to Regina unless Oberto stabs Job. Frederick appears again just in the nick of time to save Job. Gulnara comes in and recognizes her former king and confesses her plan, which was that Oberto was to kill Job, his own father, to avenge the supposed death of Frederick. Gulnara blesses Regina and Oberto, and dies.

There is nothing striking or original in the plot; there is little incident and no real climax. The chorus stands helplessly looking on, and seems almost like the chorus of a Greek tragedy. The whole plot lacks unity, and the music is in harmony with the plot. There are numerous bits of harmony and passages that are very pathetic. The tenor solo in the third act, and a final sextet with full orchestra are really excellent; but the connecting passages are awkward and unmeaning. The composition of the opera shows decided immaturity. The composer has made use of all his instrumental force throughout the opera. To be sure, he has balanced the instruments very well, but the uninterrupted, full volume of sound becomes monotonous; and Sig. Libani has furthermore an unfortunate tendency to make long crescendo movements with a loud explosion of brass instruments at the end. The bassoon seems to be a favorite instrument with him, and its frequent prominence produces a most unpleasant effect. The vocal part of the opera is melodious only for the tenor. The contralto part descends almost into loud recitation; and the bass generally meanders carelessly among his five lowest notes. The composer frequently leaves the singers unsupported by the instruments. This effect is often very pleasing, especially in piano choruses well performed; but the Italians sing too much by ear to execute this style of music well, and consequently the two choruses of that nature failed most pitifully: one, on the stage, where the tenors took the wrong note, and another, behind the scenes, where they were all out of time. On the whole it may be said that the vocal part is monotonous and commonplace; that the composer has paid much greater attention to the orchestration; that the opera shows careful work and little sign of great genius. We should say that Sig. Libani had studied Gluck and Wagner and that he was a weak dilution of them both, lacking the characteristic clearness and purity of the former, as well as the daring boldness of the latter. "Gulnara" will probably cross neither the seas nor the Alps; but there is a possibility that the name of Libani may do so at some future day. We remember that Traviata was hissed at its first representation, and Sonnambula for the first six nights; and yet Verdi and Bellini have won much fame.

The Pagliano was quite full and the audience was unusually attentive and quiet. The "claqueurs" and friends of the composer managed to create some applause during the first three acts; but a dead silence at the end of the opera told plainly that it had been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The probability is that Sig. Libani will pocket his disappointment and a loss of 6,500 francs.

The failure of this individual is however of little importance except in its generic signification. The system of producing new operas only at the expense of the composer is evidently disastrous to the development of genius. No young man dares to attempt an opera unless he has five or ten thousand francs to spare; whereas a competent jury might be formed to decide knowingly whether a work had real merit and was worthy of representation or not. In which case every aspirant to musical fame might do his best and in case of failure his time only would be lost.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 17, 1870.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beethoven.

God consecrates his high-priests with an oil
Of unction, potent far beyond our dreams,
And leads them where his awful glory beams,
Through rugged pathways of divinest toil;
For peace comes perfectest thro' life's turmoil;
And crowned souls, like crowned heads, must bear
Of anguish, more than joy, a royal share,
(Ay, though with compressed lips and heart recoil!)
For the great joy evolved therefrom to Man.
And so we mourn not o'er the drear estate
Which shadowed thee, Beethoven, with its ban,—
A price how small for privilege how great!—
When thy locked senses groped upward and found there
The shining ladder reaching through the air.

J. H. B.

To the Statue of Beethoven in the Music Hall.

With downcast brow, as wrapt in musings grand,
Thou standest ever, through the lonely night,
Or when the hall, through all its listening height,
Echoes thy music from some master hand.
O wondrous heaven-taught spirit, who hast planned
These magic-woven harmonies aright
To hold us spell-bound in a strange delight,
While each emotion starts at thy command,
Cannot the subtle language of thine art
Waft us some message from the silent shore
Thrilling the depths of every world-worn heart?
A childish longing! Thou hast told before
What we, at best, interpret but in part:
We could not understand thee telling more.

—Harvard Advocate, Dec. 9.

The Centennial Celebration.

One hundred years ago to-day, in the Electoral city of Bonn upon the Rhine, of humble parentage, was born the Great Musician, whose harmonies are ringing through the world as the most fitting medium men can find for the expression of the universal heart-felt honor to his memory. For what can we say of him, which his own music, through a thousand tongues, in forms as manifold and fresh and individual as the creations of a Shakespeare, do not say for us with an eloquence and power surpassing human speech? Who shall express him truly, if it be not himself? Who declare his meaning, if we do not feel it in his Symphonies?

In the Elector's service, like his fathers, he grew up there in Bonn, while the fierce Revolution was growing and ripening into the whirlwind that swept away the Electorate and changed so much of the old order of things. His genius, too, his music was full of the new life, the spirit of the New Era. Ideals of a better future, of Liberty and Brotherhood, of Love and Truth and Beauty, of Unity and perfect Order, fired his soul and throb forever in those "struggling chords" which he "tore" out of life's hard experience, and resolved them all into sublime assurance of eternal Joy and Peace. Happy and great must be the Fatherland, which counts among its sons a Beethoven, after a Bach, a Handel, a Haydn, Mozart and so many great ones! United Germany, peaceful and strong, intelligent and just, foremost in high ideals and good works, shall be but the fulfillment of the song of all her great tone-prophets. How could a people whose civilization has been all impregnated with such deep, earnest music, fail at last to triumph over the more shallow, baneful civilization whose chief ideal was "la gloire" and evermore aggressive? If the music of a people be the expression, as we certainly believe, of the inmost deepest moral quality and instinct of that people, then the ascendancy of Germany in European politics as well as culture has been for two centuries most signally foreshadowed.

But such an influence does not stop with national boundaries; it includes the world. Here in the New World, babes as we were in Art, the music of the modern master was particularly sympathetic to the ideals, the whole spirit of the young, free republic. Beethoven's music speaks to our people with more quickening power than any other. Here in New England, in Boston, nursery of generous ideas and larger culture, Beethoven is as much a household name as Shakespeare. With the hearing of the Fifth Symphony, some thirty years ago, our musical culture and enthusiasm, in any live and earnest sense, may be said to have begun. We knew him before we knew Haydn or Mozart. We began with the greatest; he led in the rest; all the nine Symphonies have become familiar to all musically appreciative persons, and are prized among the very choicest treasures of our life. What city has a calling to take part, in the best way it can, though it be humble, in the universal celebration, if not Boston?

But to our task, which, for the present, is to give our portion of the Commemorative programme, beginning at home.

Beethoven in Boston.

The programme of the week cannot be fairly stated without a glance at the whole season. The initiative (in honoring the great Symphonist, was naturally taken by the Symphony Concerts, of which the whole series of ten has been made to pivot upon the idea of Beethoven. Not only the concert of this week (the fourth), but the opening concert, Nov. 3, and the closing one of next March (23d) have Beethoven programmes. Moreover the Symphonies of the second and third concerts have represented his great predecessors, Haydn and Mozart, the series to be continued after the birthday by his followers: Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Gade. The presentation of the four "Leonora" Overtures is another significant addition. Altogether the ten concerts give us of Beethoven's Symphonies: the three greatest, Nos. 5, 7 and 9, the whole season ending with the exquisite, sunshiny No. 8; of his Overtures, all the great ones; the two finest piano Concertos (in G and E flat); the Choral Fantasia, and divers smaller selections.—So much for Boston's own part. Theodore Thomas also caught the spirit, while his admirable Orchestra were here, and gave two noble Beethoven concerts in October, adding to the list of Symphonies the "Eroica" and the "Pastoral," with much more of Beethoven.

And now for the programme of his Birthday Week.

1. Tuesday Afternoon, Dec. 13. The Commemoration began with the Public Rehearsal of the fourth Symphony Concert.

2. Thursday Afternoon. The Concert, the noblest of the season. Programme: Third and greatest "Leonora" Overture; Soprano Solo from "Fidelio," by Mme. JOHANNSEN; Seventh Symphony.—Part II. Andante and Adagio from the "Prometheus" Ballet; Choral Fantasia (Pianist, E. PERAZO; select chorus from the Handel and Haydn Society.

3. Friday Evening, at Bumstead Hall (lower Music Hall), beautifully adorned with flowers, busts, portraits, &c., a Chamber Concert by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The programme offered as a specimen of his earlier compositions the Septet in its original form; of the middle period, the great B flat Trio, B. J. LANG pianist; and the last of his string Quartets; besides which Mrs. WATSON was to sing the Song of "The Quail" and "Kannst du das Land?"

4. This Evening, at the Boston Theatre, his great and only Opera, "Fidelio," by the combined Richings and Paropa English troupes. This everybody should attend. Report speaks very highly of their performance of it in New Haven; and the Company has given good proof of its resources throughout the week in other operas. Fidelio, Mrs. ROBINSON-BERNARD, Marcellina, ROSE HARRIS, Florestan, Mr. CARLIS, Rocco, Mr. DRATTON, an increased chorus, good orchestra, &c.

5. Monday, at 2 1/2 P.M., the Festival will be brought to a grand conclusion by a concert given jointly by the Handel and Haydn Society and Harvard Musical Association ; programming :

Overture to "Egmont.
 Quartet ["Canon] from "Fidelio."
 Mrs. H. M. SMITH, Mrs. C. A. BARRY, Mr. WINCH and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN.
 Andante and Adagio from the "Prometheus" Ballet.
 Hallelujah Chorus from the "Mount of Olives."
 Ninth [Choral] Symphony.

Numerous smaller concerts were contemplated, and reluctantly abandoned for the want of a convenient hall. But enough is as good as a feast.

NEW YORK. The Beethoven programme of the Philharmonic Society for this evening promises the Seventh Symphony; the "Egmont" music, with Frau Lichtmay for singer, and Mr. Vandenhoff as reader; and the E-flat Concerto, played by Marie Kreiss.

The Liederkrantz give the Fifth Symphony; the two Finlles from Fidelio, as well as the Quartet from the first act; the hymn: "Die Himmel rühmen des Ewigen Ehre;" and the Sonata Appassionata, by Miss Krebs.

The Beethoven Männerchor, on the 16th, in the Academy of Music, were to perform Fidelio, with the solo artists of the German Opera: Mme. Liethmay, and Messrs. Habelmann, Vierling and Franosch. And on the 17th, in their new hall, a chorus from the "Mount of Olives," a Quartet for piano and strings, and the "Kreutzer Sonata" by Messrs. Mills and Fr. Mollenhauer.

PHILADELPHIA. Mr. Wolfsohn's second Matinée, Dec. 9, was styled "The Beethoven Memorial," and presented the following works of the great master :

Sonata, D minor, Op. 31. Carl Wolfsohn.
Romanza, F major, Violin. Mr. William Stoll, Jr.
Sonata Appassionata, Op. 57. "Adelaide."
Sonata, C minor, Op. 111. Mr. Egerton Dillingham.

Mr. Charles H. Jarvis gave his Beethoven soirée on the 10th, with this programme :

Sonata, Piano and 'Cello, Op. 5, No. 1..... Beethoven.
F major. Adagio Allegro.
Messrs. Jarvis and Hennig.

Sonata, Piano, Op. 2, No. 2, A major..... Beethoven.
Three movements.
Chas. H. Jarvis

Sonata, Piano and Violin, Op. 47..... Beethoven.
Andante con variazioni.
Messrs. Jarvis and Kopta.

Sonata, Piano, Op. 106, B flat major..... Beethoven
Allegro. Chas. H. Jarvis

Concerto, Violin, Op 61, D major..... Beethoven.
Allegro ma non troppo. [Cadenza by Joachim.]
Wenzel Kopta.

Grand Trio, Op. 97, B flat..... Beethoven.
Messrs. Jarvis, Kopta and Hennig.

"The Beethoven Society of Philadelphia," an amateur association of which Mr. Carl Wolfsohn is the founder and director, devote the first of their two concerts (semi-private), to the commemoration of the master. The Bulletin says:

The rehearsals for the concert of December 17th are going on so satisfactorily that there can be no doubt of its being a grand artistic success. The Society consists of about eighty ladies and gentlemen, and it is rare to find in such a number so many beautiful voices. They have mastered the "Hallelujah Chorus" from the Mount of Olives, the lovely quartet from Fidelio (as a chorus), one of the Devotional Songs—"The Heavens are Telling"—and the Choral Fantasia. In addition, the splendid trio for soprano, tenor and bass, "Tremate, empiti, tremate," a work of rare difficulty, will be sung by three of the members, and perhaps the grand dramatic solo for soprano, "Ah Perfido," will also be given. The orchestra will play the overture to Egmont, and the Andante and last movement of the G minor symphony.

The West Philadelphia Choral Society had their Beethoven Concert on the 8th, in Concert Hall.

The especial attraction thereof was the mass in C; a noble work, and full of inspiration. It is to be regretted that no other place could be had for its production, for much of the effect of the very creditable performance of the Society was lost by reason of the very indifferent acoustic properties of the hall. Very careful rehearsal had evidently preceded the production of this work, and we take occasion, again, to compliment Mr. Pierson in this regard, and to congratulate the Society upon the possession of so competent a conductor. The solos in the mass, is right to say, might have been, with one exception, perhaps, entrusted to more competent persons.

The soprano was by no means equal to the requirements of the music, and the tenor, we believe, can do infinitely better. A small but well-constructed orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Dietrich, performed the "Egmont Overture," and the glorious overture to "Leonora," No. 3. It also gave the accompaniments to the Mass, and to the final chorus [Hallelujah] from the "Mount of Olives," with which the concert concluded, and which was also well sung by the Society, though it would have been vastly more effective if taken less rapidly.—Ibid.

The second of Miss Jackson's concerts, known as the Parlor Concerts, which will be given Monday evening, Dec. 19th, will be devoted exclusively to the works of Beethoven. The instrumental works consist of the favorite "Ghost Trio," played by request; the celebrated "Triple Concerto" for piano, violin and 'cello; and the great string quartet Op. 74, known as the "Harp Quartet." The programme will be further enriched by M. Emil Gastel, the eminent vocalist, singing three of Beethoven's songs. With the exception of the Trio, all these works are new to a Philadelphia public.

MILWAUKEE. The Musical Society had two evenings of celebration : Dec. 6, at St. John's Cathedral, and Dec. 9, at Music Hall. On the former occasion the Marcus funebre from the Heroic Symphony, and the entire Mass in C were performed, under the direction of Mr. R. Schmels, with accompaniment of orchestra and organ. On Friday evening a concert, with an orchestra of fifty, and this programme :

Overture to "Egmont."
 Seventh Symphony. A major.
 Aligned, Song for Soprano. . . . . Words by Goethe.
 Miss Juliette Austin.
 Fifth Concerto for Pianoforte, E flat major.
 First movement by Mr. Chas. W. Dodge.
 Second and Third movements by Mr. Otto Von Gumpert.
 Duo for Soprano and Tenor (Leonore—Florestan), from "Fidelio." (Second Act, No. 15.
 Miss Juliette Austin and Mr. Wm. H. Jacobs
 Romanas, in G. . . . . for Violin.
 Mr. Emil Weinberg.
 Overture, "Leonore." No. 2.

CHICAGO. The Germania Männerchor do the honors here, giving two concerts under the direction of Mr. Balatka :

Friday, Dec. 16.

Jubilee Overture.....C. M. von Weber.
Oration on the Life and Works of Beethoven.
Rev. Robert Laird Collier.
Festival Cantata.....H. Balakia.
Festival Poem, written by.....Dr. C. H. Fowell.
Allegretto and Scherzo, Eighth Symphony... Beethoven.
Grand Aria.....Mozart.
Triumphal Battle Song of the Greeks after the Battle of Salamis.....Gernsheim.

Saturday, Dec. 17.

Overture, Leonore No 2 in C.....	Beethoven.
"Ah Perfido," Grand Aria.....	"
"The Heavens are Telling".....	Haydn.
"Adelaide".....	Beethoven.
Aria.....	"
Ninth Symphony.....	"

NEW HAVEN. The city of the Elms led off last week, with a four days Festival, with excellent intention and devoted labor, having organized a "Beethoven Festival Association" for the purpose, and with a programme good and fit (so far as we have seen) in all except the opening and closing items (an English Opera and the "Battle Symphony"). We are sorry to read, therefore, in the Independent, that the accounts of the performance are not flattering.

'The Richings Opera Company gave a performance of 'Fidelio,' to which they were not fully equal. The Mass in C was sung, Miss Krebs played the E flat concerto and the sonata characteristic, and there were various other selections, both vocal and instrumental, making, upon the whole, an excellent series of programmes. Unfortunately, the directors were rash enough to attempt the Choral Symphony; and they failed in it. A successful interpretation of that extraordinary work is a rare and brilliant achievement, which would cover any musical society with glory. We do not believe it is possible anywhere in America outside of Boston. The public in New Haven manifested but a languid interest in the festival, and the pecuniary results were disheartening.'

MONTREAL. We have the programme of a performance on the 15th, given in the Salle St. Patrice, with a choir of 75 voices and an orchestra of thirty, under the direction of Mr. Boucher :

Overture, "Prométhée"..... Beethoven.
Sleepers Wake! Choral de "St. Paul"..... Mendelssohn.
L'Absence—Mélodie..... Beethoven.
Le Tremolo [de DesJérôt]. Caprice sur un Thème de Lacini et lo piango. Romance de "Rinaldo"..... Händel.
Cum Sancto Spiritu, Fugue de la "Messe soieinnelle" Lacini.

Ouverture: "Les Ruines D'Athènes".....Beethoven.
Kyrie, de la Messe en Ut....."
Andante et Allegro, Sonate Pathétique....."
Adelaide, Romance [transposée]....."

Thème de la "Flûte Enchantée," varié par. . . " "
 Alléluia, Grand Chœur du "Mont des Oliviers" " "
 God Save the Queen, avec les variations propres de " "

This, for the present, exhausts our available material. Doubtless we shall hear of many more such celebrations in the music-loving cities of the wide land. Of course, the story, were it all told, would fall far short of what is done in Europe, though it speaks well for our young nation.

Of the principal Beethoven Commemorations abroad we have already given the leading features of the various plans, many of which were carried out weeks and months in advance of the actual Birthday. Many more, in Germany, are necessarily postponed by the war. But this will not interfere with the greatest of them, in the city where Beethoven spent the larger part of his life and wrote his greatest works; for we read:

A letter from Dr. Sonnelethner, the only living friend of Beethoven, to a London journal, gives some interesting information respecting the Beethoven centennial in Vienna. The festival is to last four days. On the 16th of December "Fidelio" will be sung, with the finest artists procurable, not only in the leading roles, but even in the small parts and the chorus. The concert on the 17th will include the Grand overture in G, with the orchestra, by K. Klauß, by the Gustav Schumann and the Chorus. Symphony on the 18th. Sunday Mass in D will be sung. On the 19th there will be a concert of chamber music and a representation of "Egmont."

London, however, does the most, giving in successive Crystal Palace Concerts, until Christmas, all the nine Symphonies, all the Piano Concerts, &c., &c., besides divers whole series of Chamber Concerts. Most remarkable, as also showing the unbounded English appetite for quantity, is the programme of the Philharmonic Concert one day in July, which contained the entire Choral Symphony, the Choral Fantasia, the Symphony in C, No. 1, the Dervishes' Chorus, the Terzetto: "Tremate, empi," and the Scena: Ah! perdido!"

CONCERT REVIEW. Crowded out. Next time.

The Business of Criticism.

(From the New York Tribune.)

A newspaper editor is forced to confront a great many nuisances in the course of his daily labor, but none that are quite so hard to bear as the obtuse though sometimes well-meaning people who cannot see the difference between criticism and advertising. The journalist's right to a free expression of his convictions on political and economical questions is readily admitted; it ought to be equally well understood that his criticisms in the different branches of the liberal arts are deliberate and honest judgments, and an interested person who attempts to influence them commits precisely the same offense as the politician who offers an editor bribes to desert the principles of his party. In every well conducted newspaper the four critical departments, literature, art, music, and the drama, are committed to the care of gentlemen who have qualified themselves, by long study and experience, to distinguish the true from the false in those particular branches, to tell whether a performance is good or bad and why it is either the one or the other, to encourage merit by discriminating praise, and check folly, humbug, and vice with judicious censure. The public are supposed to await their verdict with confidence that it will be the frank and deliberate opinion of men who possess some special qualifications for pronouncing a verdict. At any rate the journalist makes a tacit promise to his readers that his criticisms shall possess this character, and when he allows them to be anything else, he is guilty of false pretenses.

These principles are so plain that it is a wonder how anybody can misunderstand them; yet nothing is more common than for persons otherwise sensible and upright to enter a newspaper office with requests which are dishonorable to those who make them and insulting to those to whom they are made. Sometimes the agents of this petty fraud are vulgar fellows who have not the art to conceal their dishonesty, and then it is easy to turn them out of doors,—as we have often done to our great satisfaction. Such, for example, was the manager who not long ago offered certain critics a handsome sum of money, “to be applied to charitable or other purposes,” if they would support an enterprise in which he was about to engage—and in which we are happy to say that he signally failed. Such are the directors of the so-called "Conservatory Concerts," who inclose with the press tickets a ten dollar bill. These people are not the editor's worst annoyances, because he can kick them without any compunction. But sometimes the insults come from reputable ladies and gentlemen, really unconscious of their offense, and such as these it is harder to deal with. The young lady who brings her volume of silly verses for review, and insists upon having "a nice kind of notice," because she is poor, or because she is ambitious, believes that the business of a critic is "to help people along." Dear Miss! cannot you understand that you are on trial, and the critic is your judge, and the public your jury? What has the editor to do with your personal history? He must not look beyond your book, and, if he does, unless he is a very Rhadamantus, he cannot be an honest man. The artist who begs us to visit his studio and praise his latest picture,—does he suppose that we have nothing better to do than to advertise him? When his work is on public exhibition we shall go to see it, but we shall go in the interest of the public and not to please the painter; and in the meantime if he wants "a notice" he can write it himself, and have it printed in the advertising columns of The Tribune for so much a line. The artists who united a little while ago in recommending us to employ a certain worthy and accomplished gentleman as art critic for this paper, probably did not know that they were committing a gross impropriety, but almost everybody else is conscious of it. The publishers who send us eulogistic reviews of their books, and expect us to print them, probably forget that in courts of justice it is not usual for the prisoner's counsel to write the charge from the bench; and when they urge, as they often do, that the tone of a criticism ought to depend in a greater or less degree upon the liberality of the advertising, they are perhaps unconscious that they are virtually offering the judge pecuniary compensation for a ruling in their favor. The concert-singer who comes here from a distant city, bringing some beautiful encomiums from admiring friends, is sadly disappointed if The Tribune refuses to print them in advance of her appearance. The agent of an unknown performer, who asked us confidentially the other day how he could secure the help of the press, was amazed when he was told that he could not secure it at all, and grieved when we assured him that "preliminary puffs" could not be obtained for money, and it was not the business of the critic to help in drumming up an audience. Theatrical agents who vex the editorial patience with entreaties for—"just a few lines to call attention to the advertisement,"—and weary us with offers of free tickets; and, worst of all, the French prima donna, who paves the way for her debut with a noon-day breakfast to the press, or a petit souper, at which criticism is to be corrupted in advance with cajolery and champagne,—these are guilty of outrages upon propriety and common sense which are not resented only because they have become so common that their enormity is overlooked. What would be thought of a prisoner on trial, who should ask the judge to dinner?

It is unfortunately true that there are critics who tolerate corrupt proposals, and accept dishonorable civilities, just as there are newspapers with no principle except money-getting; but such critics are not found in the front ranks of journalism; they make their own reputation, find their own level, gather their dirty dollars, and exercise no more influence upon art than the auctioneer or the bill-poster. We have nothing to say of this class of men at present; our business is rather with the authors, actors, and artists of all kinds who refuse to see that the favor of an honest critic is neither to be begged with soft words, nor bought with a bottle of wine, nor conciliated with a costly advertisement; that newspaper offices are not asylums for the relief of the indigent and undeserving; and that no gentleman accepts hospitality and then sits down to write a cold and strictly just analysis of his entertainer's work. Perhaps it is an uncourteous thing to say,—but public exhibitors and performers of all sorts, and their agents and managers, when they visit an editor's office generally come on impertinent errands. After their books, their pictures, their acting, their music, have been fully judged and pronounced upon, let them be as civil to the journalist as they please; but while waiting for the verdict, they ought in delicacy to keep aloof.

Miss Annie Louise Cary.

The Portland Advertiser gives an interesting biographical sketch of Miss Annie Louise Cary, the contralto, who has of late given Bo tonians so much pleasure at the Nilsson concerts.

"Miss Cary is a daughter of Maine, and her family still live in the neighboring town of Gorham, where the first indications of her talent are still freshly remembered. Her ancestors lived in North Bridgewater, Mass., and were noted for some generations for their musical attainments. Her grandfather moved to this State in 1815. Her father was bred to the profession of medicine, to which he brought sound sense, good habits, winning manners and an enthusiasm which insured success. Her mother was Maria Stockbridge, of Yarmouth, long deceased, but warmly remembered for her many virtues. In 1842 Dr. Cary was living in the town of Wayne, in Kennebec county, where his daughter Annie Louise, the youngest of the family, was born. He removed some years later to Gorham, where he has ever since resided. It was a musical family, and Annie's true ear and voice were marked at a very early period. She could sing before she could talk plainly, often chiming in with the older members of the household when singing. Though early recognized as a charming singer, she had no musical instruction except what she received at home, until 1859, when, having completed her education at the Gorham Seminary, she went into her brother's family in Boston. There her rich contralto voice appears to have attracted immediate attention, and early in 1860 she was engaged to sing in the quartet choir at Dr. Stowe's church in Bedford street. After two years in Bedford street, she sang for an equal time at Dr. Lowell's church, and for two years more at Dr. Huntington's. During those six years Miss Cary was a pupil of Mr. Wheeler, and received instruction from other teachers in Boston. More and more the possibility of her future opened before her. She began to sing at concerts in the cities and larger towns of New England, and learned to trust her powers. In 1866 she fully determined to visit Europe, in order to get herself under the training of the best masters, and to learn thoroughly the French and Italian languages. Before her departure she gave a farewell concert, to her friends and acquaintances at Gorham. Her father, brothers and sisters assisted at this most enjoyable entertainment, which called out an audience that filled the Congregational church at the village to overflowing. In August, 1866, well provided with letters of introduction to friends in London, Paris and Milan, but otherwise depending on her own resources, she started for Europe. The journey from Boston, through Liverpool, London and Paris to Milan, was accomplished in eighteen days. From London to Milan she was entirely unaccompanied, and passed the last forty hours without food or rest. At Milan Miss Cary met a countrywoman, Miss Whitten, of Boston, since deceased. Together these two ladies devoted eighteen months in unintermitting study to the language of the country and the art of music. Afterward they visited in company, Florence, Rome, Naples and other Italian cities, travelling leisurely, and returning after their vacation to Milan and music. In the ensuing winter Miss Cary was engaged with an Italian troupe to sing in Copenhagen, where she made her debut upon the operatic stage. Her reception here was very flattering, and attracted by the glowing comments of the press, one of the Strakosch brothers presently sent for her to meet him in Stockholm, where she sang for the remainder of the season. At Stockholm she was presented to the king of Sweden by the American Minister, and was received with extraordinary courtesy and attention. The next eighteen months were spent by Miss Cary in Germany, in study, except that during the opera season she returned to Copenhagen. Her services were also in request from time to time at concerts in Hamburg, Brussels and other German cities, and she sang also at Christiania in Norway. Last winter Miss Cary was in Paris, still studying her profession, and in February, through the influence of Mr. Strakosch, she was persuaded to appear in London. Her success there was the crowning triumph of her career and led to the engagement with Strakosch to visit this country with Mademoiselle Nilsson. Her first appearance in New York was on the 19th of September, and since that time she has shared the honors of the fair Swede, whose soaring soprano Miss Cary's rich contralto so admirably supports.

Beethoven.

[From the Philadelphia Post, Dec. 17.]

Just one hundred years ago to-day Ludwig van Beethoven was born in Bonn, and to-day the musical world everywhere celebrates the anniversary. In all the cities of Germany, in London, in the cities of England and America, in Rome, in Florence, everywhere where Beethoven's name is known, his music will be played, and he will be thought of to-day. There is something pleasant in the thought that this most universal tribute ever offered to the memory of a great man should not only be to one whose life was so pure and noble, whose dedication to his work so complete, but that the work itself should be the pursuit of art, and this of so high a type. The man who was in the habit of saying, "The barriers are not yet erected which can say to aspiring genius and industry, thus far and no farther!" was not likely to stop short in fulfilling his own great mission. As has already been said, it is not easy to estimate Beethoven's value to the world, for he not only wrote great works, but he has also inspired them, and if we were to take out of modern music all that owes its existence to his influence, we would leave a fragmentary mass that would hardly hint at its former glory. The richness of orchestral effects, the flexible management of modulations, the greater variety in harmonies, the vivid expression of the life that never lends itself to words, the mastery of genius over pedantry, are among the benefits we owe to Beethoven, but in his own legacy to us he has given to us as a king might. His symphonies, his sonatas, his songs, Fidelio, the overtures and masses, the chamber music of all description, suggest a world of wealth, and the modern music without Beethoven is something impossible to realize.

It is easy for us, looking back at the life bounded by the two dates, December 17, 1770, and March 26, 1827, to see that much of the strength and intensity of his music is due to the isolation and concentration of his life, but this was not easy for Beethoven himself to realize. There can be no question of his fortitude nor of his understanding how incomplete and hard was his life. To say that he was deaf is but pointing to the door that stood closely barred between him and happiness. He was a musician, and lived in silence. Even the shouts of pleasure when his works were heard, were but dumb show to him, and we who will hear to-day his music can well afford to think of the author, who never heard it. But this deafness shuts him out from all the pleasures of life, and there is no history of a more tender, more lonely heart, than Beethoven's. When this deafness first came upon him he desired to die, but suicide is not possible to such natures, and he says: "I could not quit this world before I had produced all—had done all that I was appointed to do! When my mission is accomplished, then thrice welcome death! I have been guided through life by Patience, the handmaid of Truth; I will go with her, even to the footstool of the Eternal."

Life was compulsory on this man, and so finally the art that saved him rewarded him, and when Beethoven died he knew that he had lived to a noble purpose. There is little to tell of his career that is suitable for brief newspaper notice, but the lesson of his life ought to be lost on no one. It is his misfortune that none of his biographers have comprehended the breadth of his character, and the mass of insignificant incidents they give us cannot be considered in any degree expressive of his nature; but he found his true utterance for himself, and to understand Beethoven we have only to close our ears to all who explain him, and listen to himself as he speaks in his music.

Weber's Operas.

[From the London Orchestra.]

Karl Maria Von Weber has proved to be the popular composer in the present pre-winter campaign of the opera at Convent Garden. The disagreements in the domestic economies of Oberon, his quarrels with the fair partner of his fairy existence, and the strange mode adopted by Puck for the fulfilment of Oberon's dangerous vow, interpreted by the honest and simple mind of Weber, seem to suit the temper of the public just at this time, and appear more in harmony with the tone of the art-loving community than the stream of harmonic development to be heard in Mozart, the glitter, clang, and contrast of Meyerbeer, the elegant and sparkling arrangements of Rossini, the long sustained verve of Verdi, the fanatical reformations of Wagner, or the academic disposition of Ambroise Thomas. And yet what is popular in the "Oberon" of Weber was popular at its first representation—now some almost fifty years ago. The aria "Oh! 'tis a glorious sight to see" was voted vulgar and rowdy; the quartet "Over the dark blue waters" a lovely and most delicious joy; the fairy chorus that opens the first act a genuine inspiration—something brought down or up from the real fairy land; the great sea-song something between sacred astonishment and an unmistakable bore; the mermaid's reverie and the temptation of the sirens, genuine delights; and lastly the home song of Fatima—"O Araby, dear Araby,"—the favorite of Weber himself—the composition he considered to be the most original throughout the entire work—with all these movements, time has not changed the verdict of half a century. New schools and new notions of the connection between human affections and musical sounds, new theories of the laws of association between objective art and subjective mind, have had no effect, wrought no change with regard to the artistic or public opinion of the position of the "Oberon" as a dramatic work. People like and love now what their fathers and mothers liked and loved in the days of its composer; and what was not understood or appreciated fifty years ago is very much in the same situation in this our present time. The commonly received forms of composition—the waltz, march, romance, cavatina, song, aria, grand scena—such as they are in his opera—are forms understood and accepted now as at first; and in Weber's hands it is admitted these forms, in their several positions, afford a higher enjoyment and produce a more artistic effect, by reason of his own deep spirit and his keen vision into the regions of fairy land. No doubt externally there is a freshness in the laying out of these movements, more ways and means than had been generally known for getting out of the themes every point that was possible; but the great charm is their freedom from all borrowing or copying, or working up a stereotyped routine, or relying on old traditions, or any pedantic attempt at purifying anomalies supposed or otherwise. It is Weber—man and artist—revealing life in fairy land, knightly and courtly life, oriental life—now suffering, now rejoicing—in his peculiar broad and graceful melody, in his own strange, weird, and fitful melancholy. The movements that are liked are felt to be not mere music-making, but clear visions into the world the composer was dealing with; and the movements not popular may be classed as so many struggles of the composer to gain a grasp over the world of harmonic sounds into a definite expression of that which perhaps after all is really beyond definite expression. The instant a composer shows himself to be getting rather wild, fitful, fussy, or infuriated, it is plain that personal unrest, physiological disquiet, have got the upper hand, and he is no longer under the control of the pure spirit of art. There is no lack of fancy or freedom in the "Oberon," its spirit is ever rich and full of charm; but it has not the even flow of the "Freischütz," the ready and effective power over the dramatic situation, the right, and therefore the popular expression of the scene. Of the "Freischütz" Beethoven said: "There are things here just as I should have done them;" and the remarks of old Michael Haydn, a stiff, stern, square veteran of a critic, are as true and pointed now as when he delivered them. "The 'Freischütz' demonstrates enormous power, used with the most legitimate effect. It is brimful of a rare delicacy and high spirit; and its music is marvellously descriptive of the feelings and situations of the persons in the opera, and even marked by consummate scholarship." Every musician felt the power of the drinking song and the "io in A minor that follows this diabolical attempt at jollity; and when there is added to these the Imprecation or Litany which opens the second act it is impossible to gainsay the fact that a new prophet had arisen up in the operatic world, one who had surpassed his contemporaries, if not his predecessors, in the forcible and veritable portraiture of scenes of the utmost difficulty to realize, and infinitely beyond the reach or grasp of minds of ordinary calibre and endowments.

Here was not a question of romantic myth, national legend, scientific music, or scenic arrangement, but it was the long desired thing done, and well done—the perfection of the German musical drama. Here was the Gluck theory planted on native soil and made national. Here was Rossini, with all that was bad and objectionable in the Rossinian element exorcized. The drama is the story of human beings, whom every one can recognize and feel to be ordinary mortals, people we all have known and mixed with, haunted by an extraordinary and savage imp of Satan casting a cloud and a misery wherever he happened to show himself. A gallery of loveable pictures darkened by infernal struggles and disquiets; but no more so than the time and place rendered natural. It was reserved for Meyerbeer and his scribe to render the legend, exaggerated and oppressive. But easy it is to turn the romantic into farce, and sometimes difficult to prevent the sublime turning off into the ridiculous. Weber gave up his very being to his subject; Meyerbeer took his subject to develop himself and his new grasp on the Weberian method. Both the "Freischütz" and the "Robert," are great works, wonderful in their organization and display of technical power; but whilst the "Freischütz" is honest truth and grand poetry, "Robert" is the dressing up of dramatic means, the application of known resources, the appeal to the tastes and prejudices of the audience, the result of the clever craftsman thoroughly skilled in all the mechanical specialities of the modern opera. If there had been no "Freischütz" there would have been no "Robert;" and if no Weber, then no Meyerbeer.

What the "Freischütz" did for Meyerbeer, the "Euryanthe" has done for Richard Wagner. It may be said, Why has Wagner taken for his model an opera which failed so unequivocally as the "Euryanthe?" True it is that this opera met with no genuine success, but it may be a good opera notwithstanding. The story is disagreeable and not well put together; but for real, earnest, downright truth, the "Euryanthe" is unparalleled; and why it should remain unheard and unknown is perhaps only to be explained by the dread that managers justifiably entertain at attempting to reverse the unanimous judgment of the rarely mistaken public. The public were wrong in Weber's day in condemning this work.

and the public are wrong now in permitting it to lie on the shelf and in obscurity. There are many movements in the "Euryanthe" quite equal in fire and originality to the overture; and of the overture we need not write a line. All the cavatinas are, without exception, beautiful; and each of the finales to the three acts are fine; the first, indeed, is now doing duty as part of the "Oberon," at Convent Garden, although it suffers much by its transposition. The Knight's chorus which opens the opera, and the romance which follows it, would be difficult to match in any French or German opera of these days; and none but Weber could pen the opening of the second act, the duet and aria that follow. When this opera first appeared there was a notion that every form of composition should be based on the fugue; that is to say, its growth and structure should follow that order of tonic relation which had been laid down as the law of this highest style of logical composition. As neither the musician nor the amateur were able to trace this rule in much of the "Euryanthe," the whole of the opera was set down as the work of an enthusiast determined upon upsetting the practices and regulations of all his predecessors in dramatic composition. But it is not so; the "Euryanthe" is built up as legitimately as the "Freischütz" or the "Oberon," and its differences and variations arise more from the necessity of the subject, than any whim or caprice on the part of the composer. Richard Wagner has enlarged Weber's method, intensified all his inventions, doubled and trebled his orchestra, but he has never surpassed him in the real poetry of the art. In fact there is much of the "Euryanthe" which it is utterly impossible to imitate, and which is never likely to be excelled. The presentation of this opera would open the door to the Wagner dramas. And if their composer is to come to London, and do what he has been doing at Munich, his first and best work would be to prevail on his manager to bring out the "Euryanthe." If the "Hamlet" by Ambroise Thomas may be said to have succeeded, and the "Oberon" continues to be as popular as it is now, there is yet a chance for Weber's much abused, and we think, very ill used work. If Gluck did great things, and we know he did, Weber has done greater; the full justice will not be done him until his three grand operas are thoroughly familiar to the public.

Nilsson.

[From Harper's "Easy Chair."]

And what a vision they beheld! A young, blooming, fair-haired woman, whose earnest, honest, comely face looked frankly and with bright good humor at the audience; who moved rapidly to the front of the platform, and stood calm and erect, with one hand resting quietly over the other before her. Then, when the prelude was ended, she sang, with a fulness, a richness, a simplicity, a power and expression, which were wholly satisfactory. The impression was that of the purest artist. The soul of the singer was rapt in the song, and, as she bowed to the storm of applause, it was with the same self-possession cordiality as if she were delighted that the audience enjoyed with her and through her the exquisite music. So fresh, so buoyant, so composed, so superior, yet so sympathetic and magnificent, it was impossible not to feel the most inexpressible pity for the elder cavaliers in expansive waistcoats, who looked at her through large lorgnettes, and then said, "Ah, you should have heard Malibran!"

The Easy Chair resolved not to betray that kind of senility at least, and, indeed, it found no difficulty whatever in being as young as on that deeply-in-heart-forever-to-be-cherished day long ago in Berlin, when the little door opened at the side of the platform, and the diva of to-day appeared. The impression of that appearance is universal. It is not in the least that of the portrait which has been exhibited in the windows. It is not a half-shy, dreamy girl, with head inclined; it is a young woman, in full and conscious possession of every power, who, richly and exquisitely attired, moves to the front, and with a truly radiant and dazzling smile—a smile not of tender appeal, but of proud, conscious self-assertion—conquers the audience before she begins. No woman ever stood upon a stage with more perfect knowledge of all her powers, nor with a finer instinct of their use. Her face light: the moment it strikes the audience. She magnetizes that audience with a glance. She plays with the crowd as with a single lover. She speaks to it with her eyes, with every movement of her head and hands. She is, first of all, and in no poor sense, coquette. The voice, the singing, are but parts of her spell.

Yes, Musicians, the Easy Chair does, indeed, remember Jenny Lind, and what an artist she was; and Grisi, and how superb she was; and the other singers, and how pleasant they were. But it has heard another who, differing from the best, yet ranks with them—a woman to whom five talents have been given, and who has made them other five. Over and through all your most learned and conclusive criticism, hark!

"O love, they die in you rich sky,
They flint on field or hill or river."

For what are human voices and the gift of singing bestowed?

"Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever."

No, no; good night, dear Musicians. Memory is the critic to-night:

Blow, bugle blow, set the wild echoes flying;
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying."

Clara Anastasia Novello.

[From the London Choir.]

This eminent singer is the daughter of the late Vincent Novello. She was born on the 10th of June, 1818. At the age of nine years her parents placed her under the care of their friend, Mr. John Robinson, organist of the Catholic chapel, York, in order that she might derive, at one and the same time, the advantages of country air and diet with those of judicious preparatory tuition, as well in singing as piano forte playing. Miss Hill, of York, was the first singing-teacher.

Here, under regular discipline, Clara laid the foundation both of her subsequent excellence as a vocalist and of her fine health. There are many in York who remember the small, clear, and childish treble of little Clara Novello at the Catholic chapel in that city.

In the year 1829 she returned home to London, and highly amused her parents, while she excited their fond anticipations by her exhibitions of professional progress. Her showy pieces at this early period were, "The soldier tired," the variations upon the Irish melody, "My lodging is on the cold ground," and the air in the Beggar's Opera, "Cease your fanning," in which Madame Catalani and Mrs. Salmon used to enchant the town.

In the same year her father and mother, upon their return from a visit to the widow and sister of Mozart, at Salzburg, happening to take Paris in their way, found that a vacancy for a pupil in the singing-school for church music was to be filled up in the course of a few days. Mr. Novello instantly made interest with M. Choron, the admirable and respected head-master of the establishment, in behalf of his daughter Clara, who was fortunately at that time on a visit to Boulogne.

It was necessary that she should undergo a trial and examination previous to admission, whereupon her mother instantly left Paris, and in three days produced her daughter for the trial. She sang one or two pieces (the "Agnus Dei" of Mozart's Mass No. 1, and "The soldier tired"), when the examination was concluded in her favor against nineteen competitors. It was in this excellent academy that she acquired her solid and firm sostenuto, from singing (without the instruments) the choral pieces of Palestrina, Leo, Handel, etc. The cause of her quitting Paris arose from the ecclesiastical establishment being broken up, at the breaking out of the revolution in 1830.

Upon her return to her native country, she made her debut here in public at the benefit concert of Mrs. Sewell, at Windsor, where she sang in the duet, "Forsake me not," from Spohr's Last Judgment, and the little ballad, "Chagrin d'amour."

Shortly after this she received an engagement for the whole series of twelve ancient concerts; and, in the same season, the compliment of being engaged by the directors of the Philharmonic Concerts, where she sang "Per Pietà," of Mozart. In the same year, 1833, she made her first appearance at a provincial festival in Worcester; and in 1834 she formed one of the orchestra at the centenary celebration of Handel in Westminster Abbey. In the same year, the members of the Philharmonic Society again testified their appreciation of her talent, by electing her an associate of their institution. She was at that time only sixteen years old.

After a long course of study in Italy and Germany, this lady appeared on the stage in 1841, at Milan, Bologna, &c., and was everywhere received with enthusiasm. In 1843 she appeared at Drury Lane Theatre, in a translation of Parini's Sappho, and achieved a triumph, in spite of the pooriness of the music.

Clara Novello's style is purely "correct and rational," says a musical critic of the period. She takes no unwarrantable liberties with her author, and what graces she introduces are never redundant or at variance with the character of the music. Her sostenuto is remarkable for firmness, equality and extension. This valuable qualification in her singing is attributable to her early practice of the long suspensions that constantly occur in the choral music of Palestrina, and which formed part of her almost daily lesson while in Paris.

On the 22d of November, 1843, this accomplished lady was married to the Count Gigliucci, of Fermo, in the Roman States. The Countess Gigliucci took her leave of the profession at the Crystal Palace in the Messiah, but she gave, Nov. 26, 1860, a farewell concert at St. James's Hall. Her farewell, it was justly remarked, was in admirable harmony with her pure and spotless career. "It was a manifestation of pure unadulterated art from beginning to end," observed a leading musical journal, "and at the termination of the concert the vast assembly dispersed with the most intimate conviction that music had lost one of its most gifted and justly distinguished representatives," one who for ten years, with Mr. Sims Reeves, had maintained the English school at a lofty standard of excellence.

Faust in English.

The translation of Faust in the original metres by Mr. Bayard Taylor, which is to-day published by Messrs. Fields, Osmond & Co., will be a surprise to lovers of Goethe; even to those among them who know Mr. Taylor's earlier works well. It is not only a success, in the common sense of the word—not only a faithful rendering of the sense of the original, in pleasing English verse—but it is a transfer of the spirit and the form of that wonderful book into our own tongue, to an extent which would have been thought impossible had it not been made.

In proof of this we give the following choral song of Easter morning, at the end of the first scene; a song which has always been one of the metrical glories of the German language and the despair of translators. Mr. Taylor has rendered it line for line, and almost word for word; yet preserving the peculiarities of the verse and much of its melodious beauty, without the sacrifice of one of its double rhymes:

CHORUS OF ANGELS.

Christ is arisen!
Joy to the mortal one,
Whom the unmerited,
Clinging, inherited
Needs did impale.

CHORUS OF WOMEN.

With spices and precious
Balm, we arrayed Him;
Faithful and gracious,
We tenderly laid Him;
Linen to bind Him,
Cleanly wound we;
Ah! when we would find Him
Christ no more found we!

CHORUS OF ANGELS.

Christ has ascended!
Bless hath invested Him—
Woe that molested Him,
Trials that tested Him,
Gloriously ended!

CHORUS OF DISCIPLES.

Has He, victoriously,
Burst from the vaulted
Grave, and all gloriously
Now sits exalted?
Is He, in glow of birth,
Rapture creative near?
Ah! to the woe of earth
Still are we native here.
We, his aspiring
Followers, Him we miss;
Weeping, dreading,
Master, thy bliss!

CHORUS OF ANGELS.

Christ is arisen,
Out of corruption's womb:
Burst ye the prison.
Break from your gloom!

Praising and pleading Him,
Lovingly needing Him,
Brotherly feeding Him,
Preaching and speeding Him,
Blessing, succeeding Him,
Thus is the Master near—
Thus is He here.

There are, of course, many passages in which the translation is less successful than this; but, taken as a whole, it is certainly much the best reproduction of any great German poem as yet given to the readers of English.—Eve. Post.

"Judas Maccabæus" and the "Messiah."

(From the London Orchestra.)

Believing, as we have repeatedly had occasion to remark, that musical thought is in abeyance, and that the phrases and forms of the language are worn out—passed into the tamest conventionalism or a petty and paltry euphuism—the consideration of artists and critics should be directed to the living portion of the legacies of the past-away great workers; for from this producing life-germ must arise the new order that is to keep in motion the harmonical system of the future. The straight-jacket has been brought within the compass of the harmonical sewing machine: our composers essay counterpoint and turn out a chorus with a certain clearness and distinctness that boasts the sanction of fashion, but altogether wanting in solidity, severity, and appeal to the heart. It is the conventional tweed-suit—always the same cut—the same dull hue—the same substance—the neat result of clever mechanism—and all for the moderate sum of three pounds. So it is with the modern oratorio chorus; and three pounds is rather more than its intrinsic merit ought to exact. The solo music is either up in the clouds, making superhuman, although unintelligible efforts, after the manner of the philosopher in the comedy of "Aristophanes," or it is the mildest exhibition of the Della Cruscan School—the sympathetic namby-pamby, docorous, without art, and continuous without thought. The one attempts the exhibition of the impossible to-be-calculated volcanic eruption; the other, the commonest known experience of time-worn, and once time-honored, use.

Such being the case, advance is necessary, somebody must improve, the atelier must be cleaned out; the workmen must look out for fresh materials, and new tools must be thought of and put into hand as speedily as possible. Invention can only spring from intercommunion with those famous for invention; there is no other way for continuing the chain of new thought and grand idea. And as the culture of the artistic mind should if possible run along parallel with the culture of the popular ear, the best way for creating the forthcoming school, and preparing the ear of the audience for its reception, is unquestionably the constant performance of him who has made the oratorio the heart and soul of musical life in this country. It is said that Mozart kept the preludes and fugues of Bach always on his clavichord; and Beethoven was ever peeping into and poring over the oratorio scores of Handel. What was good for a Mozart and appetizing to a Beethoven must be equally good and appetizing to the young Mozarts of this day, and our hungry and ravenous amateurs. The school to be—the school to come—in all probability will be some form of counterpoint such as is shadowed out at the closing portion of that grand symphony by Beethoven just before the voices break in. Nothing but counterpoint can rub away the affectations and silliness of the present attenuated forms; and the master of counterpoint, who combines with this power the force and impetus of a genial and generous enthusiasm, will sweep off the present system with one blow. Now Handel being more than a mere composer of music—that is to say a great poet—the royal singer in the oratorio—he is of all oratorio writers the one to set up; his are the oratorios to perform, and from him must be taken the lessons in art, theory, and aesthetics. Thus we say to our composers, "Do you wish to write a vocal fugue? Don't go to Marburg, André, Wolff, or Cherubini, but look into Handel. See how merciful he is; how in the midst of his learned career, he can, and does all at once, throw off the canon and the theme and its reply, and fascinates with the sympathetic force of the ethereal and the mysterious. If you cannot write clear and close counterpoint, go and seek it from some not well-known artist, and convey it into some proper niche in your work, putting alongside of it such of your own as may prove ample apology for the appropriation." Buononcini is said to have conveyed Lotti's madrigal; but as the use involved a prize, Buononcini did a very naughty and not-to-be-imitated thing. But Handel did not disdain in the Judas Maccabæus to turn to Buononcini and borrow his themes and ideas for his chorus of "Tune your harps"—a chorus never written down by his own hand, for he was blind when he composed it, and Smith, his amanuensis, dictated from him as he walked up and down his small study in Brook Street. Who would ever think of turning to the Masses by Graun, except for seeing the original upon which Handel made the first chorus in the "Judas?" Then for these several conveyances of Handel every one must rejoice, for the next movement is certain to be a roll from the magazine of the Great Thunderer. If Handel borrowed for the chorus "Mourn ye afflicted," he repaid the loan as far as we are concerned with hundredfold interest in the next chorus, "For Sion lamentation make;" and if he made his passacaglia chorus "Ah! wretched Israel!" from the theme of Bach's passacaglia, he equals Bach in learning and artistic power, and transcends him in pathos, variety, and intensity. [?] And Handel's mode of conveyancing was admirable—he worked out one composer at a time. Uria in his first Te Deum, Habermann, in his Jephtha, Stradella in his first act of the Israel, and Erba in his second, Muffat in his Joshua, and so on. Handel felt himself unequal to satisfy the English public in light themes, and he was too much pressed, and too worn to sit down for close counterpoint. For these two requisites he relied on his special friends—men whom he liked, but whom the world had not thought worthy of note or remembrance. Muffat was the man who claimed to have found out new tunes and a new school; he proclaimed his inventions with all the pertinacity of a Gluck and a Wagner. Handel liked them and knew the public would like them. Thus he borrowed the "See the conquering hero comes," and the March in "Judas" from Muffat, having at first placed the Muffat "See the conquering hero" in his "Joshua." Now the effect of this system—this wise system of conveyancing is marvellously good. It makes Handel so lively—for when his old bachelorhood is not up to the mark, and he is too grave and sedate to write pretty tunes, he turns to Steffani and Muffat, and makes these gentlemen serve his turn. When he wants a clear, hard, crisp, crystalline piece of counterpoint, he goes to his friends Kalvich, Telemann, Cesti, and Carissimi, and walks away with their very best, and makes it infinitely better when he has niched it into the place he has fixed for it. It has been said "he picked up a pebble and changed it into a diamond." This is not true; for Handel never looked at pebbles, and what scholar could be found to waste his time over a flint-stone? He reset diamonds and rubies, and pearls, and every sort of jewel upon which he could lay his hand, and further displayed them to the highest advantage by placing them alongside and in contrast with his gems—and these of the very brightest—the most luminous—the never to be matched.

In recommending our modern composers to follow the example of Handel we must note that it must be imitated with great wisdom and no less reserve. For a man who cannot write counterpoint to steal counterpoint would be as ridiculous as dangerous. For one who is incapable of composing strong, staid, and impressive melody, to appropriate the gay and the genial of his departed brother would be conduct most reprehensible and certain to be visited with unpleasant recoil. There is also another difficulty. The conventionalism of modern counterpoint is not that of past times, and with melody every genuine composer has his own order of thought, his own speciality as to the use of the chords and their progress. To borrow from Schubert—a real man in song—from Mendelssohn, Weber, Spohr or any true artist of those immediate times is out of the question; and to turn to Sarti, Pergolesi, or any of the modellers of the aria and canzonet would be fatal. These men possessed great power, great thought, great form; and no second-rate genius must adventure to take of or from them. It took all the genius of Mozart to cover up his obligations to his predecessors. We wish—may we hope—our youthful struggling immortals would borrow here and there, and go in for a little wholesale appropriation. It would be a great comfort to the public and special pleasure to the artist and critic—a rill of pure water running through the heart depressing desert. Besides, the habit of reading grand music for such purpose would pull them up, and extract something good out of them if any good be within them. It would be cowardice to borrow an idea without the intention of doing something in return. Who cares whether Handel used the southern Piff for his Christmas Shepherd piping, since it is followed by the imperishable recitatives?

Great as is the popularity of Handel, his real power is but just beginning to be appreciated. He wants space, means, and audience; and in the big round world of the South Kensington Museum he will get all there. No works but those of Handel can legitimately satisfy in this enormous concert room, and it will not be too large for his large thoughts. Such a chorus as "We worship God, and God alone," is grand anywhere, superb in Exeter Hall, but what it will be in the Albert Hall people cannot imagine. They must wait until May next before they can realize the idea in its full magnitude and truth. The rust of his antiquarianism, the pleasant spirit of his conventionalism, and the occasional necessary consequences of haste and pressure will pass away; but the real, true, special, and individual inimitable and imperishable Handel will remain and assist more in forming and perfecting the new school that is to be, than the work of any of his predecessors, contemporaries, or those that have followed after.

The History of Music.

LECTURE BY J. K. PAINE.

[Reported for the Boston Journal, Dec. 4.]

Mr. J. K. Paine delivered the first of a course of lectures at Wesleyan Association Hall, No. 36 Bromfield street, Saturday noon, on "The History of Music." These lectures are to constitute one of the regular lecture courses of Harvard University, and are to be eighteen in number. They will take place on successive Saturdays, and are given in Boston instead of in Cambridge in order that musicians and others interested may be enabled to attend. The audience on Saturday included ex-President Hill of Harvard University, Rev. Mr. Alger, Mr. John S. Dwight, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, and many of the musical artists and teachers of the city.

Mr. Paine devoted his opening lecture to the "Music of the ancient nations; music in the early centuries of the Christian era; and Ambrosian and Gregorian song." In beginning he said he would try to follow out carefully in the present course of lectures the principal steps that have marked the development of the art of music in modern times. In this new country we have thought but little of the study of music as a branch of higher education, and though we acknowledge the practical value of music in our public schools and concert halls, we have not yet taken equal interest in the scientific and historical study of the art. Many of our most cultivated lovers of music have neglected this branch as quite secondary to the enjoyment of the beautiful realizations of genius as displayed in the symphony or opera. In the lecturer's opinion, we ought not to leave out of sight any means of true enlightenment. To gain a critical understanding and thorough appreciation of great works of art, we must examine the historical process that led to their production. Only on these conditions can we do justice to composers of the past and present. The time was yet to come in America, said the lecturer, when historical concerts would be given of such a high order that they would serve as a kind of gallery of the works of art, as a means of educating us to a more Catholic taste. In Germany this has already been done to some extent.

There are peculiar difficulties, remarked Mr. Paine, in the way of tracing, step by step, the rise and progress of music from its feeble beginning in remote antiquity to the present age (from the days of Tahai Cain to Wagner), for music demands a more complex order of symbols and sounds than do mere words, in order to express and record faithfully every subtle emotion and shade of tone. Music is the natural, universal language of man, and was born with speech itself. If we turn to the most uncivilized races of men in all parts of the world, we do not fail to observe a natural love of music, as exhibited in their songs and dances or inspired recitals.

The rhythmical element first aroused the attention of primitive men, and the lowest stage of musical development was marked by the invention of the drum, tambour and castanets, instruments of mere rhythm, which served only to intensify the effect in singing or dancing. The next step was the invention of wind instruments, suggested very likely by the song of the birds, the rushing of water, the whistling of the wind, or by man's own experiments in blowing the crooked horn of an animal. Such may have been the origin of the flute, Pan's pipe and the horn. This imitation of sound in nature may have led finally to the invention of stringed instruments, like the harp, lyre and cithara. A Greek myth states that while Mercury was walking for pleasure on the banks of the Nile he struck his foot accidentally against a tortoise shell, across which some dried tendons were stretched. This blow produced a musical sound which suggested the idea of the lyre.

The lecturer said he should not devote time to examine the musical records of the old nations like the Chinese, Indians, Arabians or Persians. We find these more or less civilized people in the possession of a variety of musical instruments, of a tonal system of scales and keys, and with a kind of notation. These characteristics are likewise true of the ancient Egyptians, Hebrews and other people of pre-Hellenic culture. Classical Greece was the first land where music was cultivated for its own end. Hitherto it had held a subordinate place in accompanying singing and dancing, the rites of religion; or it was practiced for its supposed medicinal qualities. But the Greeks, with their love and worship of the beautiful, honored music as one of the highest arts. Apollo, the God of the Muses, was represented as the model of singers and musicians; and the world of their gods was full of divine music. The writings of Greek poets, philosophers and historians are full of the appreciation of music. Plato and Aristotle declared music to be a necessary branch of education. The word "music" with the Greeks signified much more than with us, for they included originally under the name not only the art of sounds, but also the arts of dancing, poetry and oratory. In Greece we can trace for the first time in history the national development of music.

The history of Greek music may be divided into three great periods. The first was that of obscure, half mythological times. The second begins with the Dorian migration, about one thousand years before Christ, and closes about the time of the Peloponnesian wars, four hundred years before Christ. This period witnessed the development and culmination of Greek music, and the names of her great musicians, Olympus, Terpander, Arion, Pythagoras, Pindar, Phrynis, and Timotheus, testify to the high degree of excellence that had been attained in all styles of lyric, heroic and dramatic music. The third period was rich with great theorists, like Aristotle, Aristoxenus and Plutarch, but also marked the decline of Greek music. The wonderful euphony and flexibility of the Greek language generated music spontaneously, as it were, and poetry and music sprang from one source. The various forms of Greek music may be classified according to the chronological order of its development. In the earlier times were sung the religious hymns of the priests; then followed the Homeric period with the heroic songs of the rhapsodists; then the age of the lyrist and great musicians; and finally, the great epoch of the drama, which was the most flourishing period of Greek music. The chorus of the drama was accompanied by dancing and instrumental music. The singing was in a kind of recitative and arioso style, the latter being used particularly in lyric poetry. The only reputed specimens of Greek music still extant are three hymns to Calliope, Nemesis and Apollo, written by Dionysius and Mesomedes. They were brought to light by Vincenzo Galilei, father of the celebrated astronomer, at Rome in 1581. The different critics have given their own versions of these productions, but Frederick Bellermann is accepted as the latest and best authority on the subject.

[Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen here sang the hymn to Apollo according to Bellermann's version, Mr. Paine accompanying him on the piano, the first time without the use of modernized harmony, and in a repetition, with its use. The effect of the latter instance was quite rich.]

Mr. Paine remarked that this music was wonderfully like Mendelssohn's music to "Antigone." It was difficult, however, to form even a feeble idea of Greek music from these specimens, he thought, for they must have become modernized to some degree by their being written in accordance with our tone system and notation. Our chief sources of knowledge of Greek music are the theoretical writings of Pythagoras, Aristoxenus and Plutarch. We are sure that the Greeks had no melody in the modern sense, for the sounds were held entirely subservient to the metre of the words, whereas in modern music, the syllables of the words are made to conform to equal measurements of time. As they had no practical knowledge of harmony, their melodies could not follow the same succession of intervals as they do in our music. Pythagoras, through the divisions of the monochord, an instrument he invented for the purpose, shows us that they did not distinguish the difference existing between a larger and smaller whole, as we do in modern times; consequently the major third being too large, and the minor third too small, they were badly out of tune, and were classed among the discordant intervals. As no satisfactory harmony can exist without the major and minor thirds and sixths, all dissonant intervals like the second, seventh, etc., could have no meaning with the Greeks, and it was left to modern Europeans to discover the hidden beauty of discords when they are used in combination with concords according to natural laws. Greek music was sung in unison or octave. No other intervals were used except the fourth and fifth, touched sparingly in the instrumental accompaniments.

The foundation of the Greek scale was the Tetrachord, a series of four tones, comprised within the limits of a perfect fourth. The Tetrachord was diatonic, chromatic or enharmonic, according to the disposition of its intermediate intervals. These Tetrachords were combined in an ascending or descending order, and were either conjunct or disjunct, as they were required to complete the series of tones composing the scale or compass of tone. The compass of tones embraced in the Greek system did not exceed two octaves.

The lecturer illustrated the Greek scales by drawings on the blackboard.

There were different keys by transposition in Greek music as in modern music. They were arranged in octave groups, and there were five principal keys which had their station, that is, their fundamental tones in the middle of the compass, and each of which was one-half a tone higher than the other. These five principal keys, accompanied by five relative higher and five relative lower keys, made fifteen keys in all, but in reality there were but twelve, as in modern music, the three highest being repetitions in the octave of the three lowest keys. Besides this class of transposed minor scales, there were diatonic octave groups which were simple rows or orders of tones composed of six whole tones and two half tones, as in our modern scale. Seven octave groups could thus be constructed. Greek notation or semiography answered the purposes of their music. It consisted of characters, letters of the alphabet and astronomical signs which represented the pitch but not the length of the tones. Among the numerous musical instruments of the Greeks were several which have come down to the present day in a modified form. For instance, the ancient phorminx or cithara was the prototype of the Cithar and Guitar; the Syrnix or Pan's Pipe and the Hydranlos or Water Organ were forerunners of the modern organ. The ancients also used various kinds of Flutes and Horns, and a favorite instrument was the Anulos, a kind of Flageolet. There were many varieties of stringed instruments, but none that were played with the bow.

With the decline of Greek civilization, music naturally sank, and, with the other arts, was transplanted to Rome, where its theories found acceptance, but its influence was limited by the new conditions of society. The Romans were mere imitators of the Greeks in music as well as the other arts. Greek music was plastic, like all Greek art. There can be no doubt that the early Christian church borrowed much of its music from the East, although this is denied by some. When the Roman world had embraced the new belief under Constantine, music, as all the fine arts, found a prominent place in the service of the church. At even an earlier time antiphonal singing was introduced in the church, and evidently owed its origin to the Greek chorus or Jewish temple music, although it is attributed to Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, who, according to a legend, heard their songs answered by angels. The first important step in the advancement of church music, was made in the Council of Laodicea, in the year 367. This Council ordered that none but authorized singers should be heard in the church. Early in the fourth century Pope Sylvester founded a school of singing, which was soon followed by others. In these schools, or under their reputed founder, Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, (who was born in 333 and died in 397,) the various tones were methodized under the name of "authentic." They were thus designated by the church to sanction their use. These four authentic modes or scales, together with the four plagal modes introduced three centuries later, were the foundation of all musical composition until the seventeenth century. The four modes were arranged from the octave groups of the ancient system.

Pope Gregory the Great, who occupied the Pontifical chair from the year 591 to 604, continued the work begun by Ambrose and his contemporaries, in regulating church music. He collected all the good songs, added new ones, had them arranged in the order of the Church Calendar, and had them written down in enduring characters. A copy of this book was laid upon the altar at St. Peter's and fastened with a chain, to serve as a standard for all future time, and from this arose the name cantus firmus, firm song. Gregory added to the four Ambrosian authentic modes four additional modes, called plagal, that is derived or borrowed, being taken from the authentic, by simply beginning the order of notes a fourth below. One of the most serviceable improvements rendered by Gregory was to drop the troublesome Greek names of the notes, and adopt the use of the first seven letters of the alphabet. The tones of the lowest octave were designated by capital letters, and the octave above by small letters. In the eleventh century, Guido of Arezzo added double letters for the third octave. Gregorian song was founded on musical metre, whereas Ambrosian song depended entirely on the poetical metre. Gregorian music was sung in slow, simple, unison notes of nearly equal length. As soon as this emancipation of music from the words had taken place, it became possible to dwell at will on the separate tones, and even to apply more than one tone to a syllable. This led eventually to the modern art of figuration and counterpoint. One of the first things needed after Gregory's innovation was a new system of notation. In Gregory's time a kind of notation was used quite different from the Greek semiography. It was called the Neumann notation, being derived from the Greek word neuma—a breath. The oldest copy of the Antiphonar of Gregory, kept on the altar of St. Peter's, was written in the Neuma notation.

This notation, which originated sometime between Ambrose and Gregory, continued in use in the church, with few modifications, until the fourteenth century. The characters were horizontal or oblique lines and points, representing the circumflex, acute and grave accent marks of Greek writings of the Alexandrian time, which may have suggested them. An improvement in the neuma notation was made by Romanus, a singer of St. Gall, who added small letters to the characters, which aided the singers to execute their notes more accurately, and superseded, in some degree, verbal teaching; but, as the intervals were indicated only approximately, the singers still labored on in the dark. The chief advantage of the improvement was to indicate effects of loud and soft (forte and piano), and the quicker and slower performance of single tones and groups of tones. But all this was superseded by the happy idea of an unknown person, viz: to draw a horizontal line over the text. In time a second line was added to represent C, the origin of our bass clef. This is the origin of the modern staff. At a later period a number of lines were added, until even as many as fifteen lines were in use; and at a later period still the notes were written on the spaces between the lines, and the number of lines did not vary from four to six until the staff reached its present form. By command of the Church, the Gregorian song was introduced into distant countries. In the seventh century, Pope Vitalian sent two Roman singers into Gaul and Great Britain, and in the following century singers were sent to France and Germany, where heathenism still prevailed. Charlemagne gave his powerful encouragement to the cultivation of music, as well as to all art and knowledge. During his reign, organs were introduced into Western Europe from the East. He founded schools of singing at Metz and Soissons, and sacred music was taught under his general direction. The most famous singing was that of St. Gall, near the boundary of Switzerland and Italy. In the Gregorian age it was demanded of every priest that he should understand singing. It was the opinion that no one could teach philosophy or religion without a knowledge of music. The prominent part that music has held in the Christian church, almost from its very foundation, marks well the progress of spiritual and intellectual culture that has grown up through the Christian religion. All through the middle ages music typifies the characters of men, and when the Reformation came the new spirit of the time showed itself in the music as well as in the lives of men. It was that the cantus firmus, like the dogmas of the church, was found to be too narrow and binding, and doomed to be broken by a higher law. Before that came, however, Gregorian song was destined to become a power in the church for over a thousand years. Attempts were made in Italy to reproduce the Greek system, and to engraft it upon the Gregorian song, but these and later efforts to revive ancient music had no other result than to postpone for a time the development of modern music, which at this early period had already gained too firm a hold on the hearts of men to be lost, notwithstanding the fact that for more than a thousand years in the Christian era, the greatest peculiarity of modern European music, which distinguishes it from all other music, ancient or modern, was lacking, viz: Harmony.

Before the close of the lecture Mr. Rudolphsen gave an interesting illustration of Gregorian song.

Beethoven Centennial Celebrations. NEW YORK.

[From the Independent, Dec. 22.]

While we write, the Beethoven Centennial is celebrating in all the principal cities of Germany, England and America, and also we believe, in some parts of Italy. The best performances in this country, all things considered, will probably prove to have been in Boston. There is no orchestra in the United States comparable with our Philharmonic; but Boston has superior advantages for the production of choral works, and a better musical public to depend upon, and consequently could offer a richer programme. The celebration in New York has been in the hands of three leading societies—the Philharmonic, the Liederkreis, and the Beethoven Männerchor—acting independently of each other, and each enlisting the enthusiasm of a large circle of connoisseurs. The public generally take no part in the festival; and, strange to say, have no opportunity of doing so, if they should be disposed. The Philharmonic Society, unable to find room for everybody who wanted to attend the extra concert on the Beethoven night, gave the preference to the subscribers for the regular season, and these entirely filled the house. The Liederkranz is a club, which admits strangers only when introduced by a member, and the club-room is too small for a miscellaneous audience. The Beethoven Männerchor, indeed, gave a public performance at the Academy of Music; but the tickets were exhausted a day or two in advance, probably because the members reserved the privilege of disposing of a large part of the house to their personal friends. Thus a man not specially favored by some musical society, or by the conjunction of good fortune and a long purse, if he wanted to celebrate the birthday of Beethoven, on the 17th, would have had to go to the circus or the poultry show. Practically the festival was not open to the general public, for which the general public, not ordinarily caring much for Beethoven, has only itself to blame.

(From the Independent.)

The extra concert given by the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY on Saturday evening in commemoration of Beethoven, drew a very good audience, though the Academy was not quite full, many of the boxes especially, being vacant. A colossal bust of the composer was placed on a pedestal decorated with wreaths of rich natural flowers in front of the stage; and a still more pleasing recognition of the occasion was given by the enthusiasm with which the artists, one and all, interpreted the following excellent programme:

Seventh Symphony ..... Beethoven
Scenes and aria, "Fidelio" ..... Beethoven
Madame Lichtmay.
Concerto for the piano, in E flat ..... Beethoven
Miss Mary Krebs.
"Egmont" ..... Beethoven
The songs by Madame Lichtmay; Illustrative Poem read by Mr. George Vandenhoff.

It would have been hard to arrange a better selection of works for such a festival, unless, indeed, we could have had the Ninth Symphony, but that of course was out of the question. The Seventh is one of the most varied, the most pleasing, and the most thoughtful of the series. It fits all moods, and with its wonderful changes of sentiment, from the tender melancholy of the allegretto to the inspiring joyousness of the fine allegro, it well illustrates the universality of the composer's sympathies. It was given with unusual delicacy and spirit, as if every man in the orchestra felt the influence of the anniversary, and wanted to do his best. Then the other selections were wisely chosen to exemplify various forms of Beethoven's genius. The recitative and air from "Fidelio" (the famous "Abscheulicher" and "Komm Hoffnung") are among the best of his vocal compositions; the concerto in E flat is a marvel of piano forte music; and "Egmont" is a dramatic conception of the very highest character. It was rather curious to contrast the effect produced by Madame Lichtmay on a concert platform with her management of the same song on the operatic stage the night before. When she sang in character as Leonore, she carried her audience away with the force of her dramatic powers and the evident feeling and intelligence of the whole personation; and when she delivers the same music in the cold atmosphere of the concert room, the faults of her vocalization impress us rather than the dignity of her style. Miss Krebs made a much more ambitious effort with the magnificent concerto than she has ever made before in New York, and she may safely be congratulated upon the success with which she has passed a trying ordeal. The work is well known to our audiences, and the performance of the young lady had to be tested by high standards which the very best pianists have hitherto set up for us. It would be warm praise to say that Miss Krebs did not disappoint us, and that the excellent opinion we had already formed of her abilities was not at all lowered by the manner in which she acquitted herself of this very serious task. But we can say more than that: her performance of this concerto has materially raised her position as an artist, and shows incontestably that she is not merely a young lady of brilliant talents and still more brilliant promise, but already an accomplished virtuoso. She has carried technical proficiency so far that her playing is almost without a blemish. Her touch is certain, delicate, forcible, and as clear as a bell. Her facility is something marvellous, and, as we said on a former occasion, she has a thoroughly musical organization. We do not say, of course, that she has sounded the depth of Beethoven's music: we do not believe that any performer can give outward shape to all the beauties which are embraced in these wonderful works, any more than the most consummate of actors can exhaust the wealth of Shakespeare. New artists are perpetually discovering in both a new meaning and a new beauty. Moreover, no very young performer can express the delicate shades of feeling, the indescribable spirituality, in which Beethoven is so far above all other composers. It is not for bright, happy, hearty girls to interpret the profoundest sentiment of the great master; and if we miss in Miss Krebs's playing some of the delicate essence which ought to exhale from such music as this E flat concerto, it is only because she has not yet reached the maturity of years, of experience, and perhaps we should say of sorrows, which is needed to perfect the highest artistic nature.

The music of "Egmont" has never before been performed by the Philharmonic Society, but parts of it are pretty well known. It was written as an accompaniment to Goethe's drama, and consists of an overture, two songs for soprano, a march, four interludes, and a few melodramatic and miscellaneous movements. To fit it for the concert room a short poetical synopsis of the drama was prepared in Germany by Mosengeil and Bernays, and this was translated into English blank verse for the Philharmonic Society by Mr. George Vandenhoff. The music, of course, divested of its proper dramatic accessories, for which reading, even by Mr. Vandenhoff's imperfect substitute, loses a great deal of its effect, but the performance was most successful, and no true lover of art can have remained insensible to the thrillingly sensational character of the close of the tragedy. The overture—a superb work—was beautifully played, and the second of the songs, Freudvoll und leidvoll ("Blissful and tearful") was given by Madame Lichtmay with sweetness and feeling. The other—a trying vivace, Die Trommel gerührt ("The drum is resounding")—taxed her ability in rapid vocalization rather too much.

The concert by the NEW YORK LIEDEKRANZ last night, at their rooms in Fourth street, was an interesting commemoration, partly from the excellence of the music selected for performance, partly from the enthusiasm of both the audience and the Society, but more than all from the fact that most of the performers were amateurs and yet cultivators of art in its highest forms. What manner of task it was which these ladies and gentlemen undertook may be judged from the programme, on which there appears the name of only one professional executant:

Fifth Symphony (C minor) ..... Beethoven
Male chorus, Die Himmel rühmen ..... Beethoven
Lied aus der Ferne ..... Beethoven
Miss Dingee.
Sonata Appassionata ..... Beethoven
Miss Krebs.
Selections from "Fidelio."

The grand Symphony, the most impressive with one exception of all the nine, was very creditably rendered by the orchestra under Mr. Paur's direction, and when we consider that only a few of the players were professional musicians, we may well feel surprise that there was no more conspicuous defect than a lack of smoothness. The chorus also in the first part was effective, but we have heard the Liederkranz sing much better on other occasions. The selections from "Fidelio" consisted of the great Leonore overture, No. 3: the quartet, Mir ist's so wunderbar (Mrs. Werner, Miss Dingee, Mr. Steins, and Mr. Nilsen), the Prisoner's Chorus, and the sextet and chorus with which the opera closes. In the sextet Mr. Can didus and Mr. Weibsch were added to the four whom we have already mentioned. To tell the truth, this finale was not very good, both the ladies, and sometimes Mr. Can didus, singing out of tune; nor was the chorus as solid and true as it is wont to be. Despite all these defects, however, many passages were rendered in a most spirited and admirable manner, and the Society deserves our thanks for the zealous and intelligent work. Miss Krebs bore off the honors of the evening. She plays the Sonata with warmth as well as brilliancy; but we have already expressed our opinion of her abilities so fully that we may spare further comment upon her excellent performance. For an encore she gave a polacca of Beethoven's—a delicate piece—and she played it charmingly.

THE BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave its second concert on Friday; and did a little for Beethoven, but not what it ought to have done. The Second Symphony was well performed, and Mr. Richard Hoffman played a part of the piano-forte concerto in C minor, playing it with the neatness, delicacy, and feeling which he always brings to the interpretation of Beethoven. The other pieces for the orchestra were the entire music of the "Midsummer Night's dream," and the overture to the "Magic Flute." Mr. Hoffman played a charming barcarole from a piano-forte concerto of Sterndale Bennett's, and Signor Lo Franc sang the prayer from Halévy's "Jewess" and Adolph Adam's Cantique de Noël.—Independent.

VASSAR COLLEGE (POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.) The Cecilia Society of Vassar College celebrated Beethoven's centennial anniversary last Thursday by a concert, under the direction of Professor F. L. Ritter. The chapel was beautifully decorated with flowers and evergreens, and brilliantly illuminated. Directly over the organ, and over the large painting of Matthew Vassar, was the name of "Beethoven" in jets of gas. On each side of the gallery were four scrolls, in colors, each containing the name of one of his principal pieces and the movement. On one side of the name Beethoven was "1770," on the other "1870." In front of the stage was a bust of Beethoven, and around it a lovely wreath of evergreens and flowers.

The programme was selected entirely from the works of Beethoven, and was as follows:

1. Sixth Symphony—Pastoral, op. 68, arranged for two pianos.
Misses Lough, Clarkson, Brace, Blair.
2. Adagio—Sonata, op. 10.
Miss E. Cornell.
3. Allegro—Sonata, op. 7.
Miss M. Young.
4. Wonne der Wehmuth.
Madame Raymond Ritter.
5. Largo and Rondo—Sonata, op. 2, A major.
Miss L. Phillips.
6. Kennst du das Land.
Miss A. Ballard (teacher of singing).
7. Andante—Sonata pathétique, op. 13.
Miss M. Raymond.
8. First Symphony—op. 21, 2d movement.
Misses Emerson, Hinkley, Miller, Shouse.
Address by Professor F. L. Ritter.
Subject: Beethoven.
9. Second Symphony—op. 35, 2d movement.
Misses Adams, DuBant, Kellogg, Cleveland.
10. Andante and Allegro—Sonata, op. 57.
Miss A. Sanford.
11. Adelside.
Madame Raymond Ritter.
12. Fifth Symphony—Op. 67, 1st movement.
Misses S. Raymond, McBain, Sage, Shepherd.
13. The Heavens are Telling.
Sung by a chorus of one hundred young ladies.

The following sonnet was written for the occasion by Fanny Raymond Ritter:

Great Beethoven! caressed by thy pure tones
We lose the sense of war's tremendous pain,— Woe-breathing-war, the exhaustless curse of Cain,—
Our sisters' shuddering sighs, our brothers' groans!
Thou, who didst love thy kind, hadst wept to greet
A birthday darkened by the dreadful pall
That o'er those hundred thousand graves doth fall,
Which gape below two king-crushed nations' feet;
Yet had thy soul, foreknowing final good,
Joyed to behold the star of freedom rise
Pale, trembling, faintly dawning in dark skies
That o'er a red abyss of horror brood:
Fair harbinger of peaceful brotherhood
In days of which thy strains are prophecies!

The exercises were admirable, and received the hearty applause of the large and select audience.—Eve. Post.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—The Providence Journal chronicles a 'Beethoven Piano-forte Recital,' given on the Birthday, as follows:

On the afternoon of that day, a company of ladies and gentlemen from the most cultivated and refined of the fashionable musical circles of Providence, assembled, by invitation, in the piano-rooms of Messrs. Cory Brothers, to listen to a recital of some of the choice pianoforte compositions of the immortal master, given in accordance with previous arrangements, by Prof. Eben A. Kelley, assisted by Mr. A. C. Greene, the well-known and esteemed tenor.

The programme for the occasion was arranged with fine taste and judgment, and contained six selections of the highest order of merit and interest, viz., Sonata Pathétique, op. 13; Sonata, (Moonlight), op. 27, No. 2; Adelside, op. 46; Andante Favori, in F; Sonata, op. 31, No. 2; and the Maria Funebre, from Sonata, op. 26. These several great and surpassingly beautiful pianoforte works of Beethoven were performed by Prof. Kelly in a manner evincing the most thorough study and the nicest appreciation of the renowned master's compositions and style, and with such a degree of earnest feeling, emotional expression, spirit and true art-enthusiasm as rendered them immensely enjoyable, and awakened in the minds of not a few of the listeners new perceptions of Beethoven's wonderful and peculiar genius. The entire recital—including the excellent rendition of the "Adelside" by Mr. Greene—was a really fitting tribute to the memory of the great composer.

BALTIMORE. Beethoven commemorations were held on the evenings of the 16th and 17th at the Concordia Opera House. The first, given by the Germania Männerchor, had the following programme:

Overture, "Egmont".....Orchestra.
Chorus of Prisoners, "Fidelio".....Male Chorus.
"Ah! Perfidio".....Soprano Solo.
Concerto for the Violin, Op. 61, Part 1, "Allegro ma non troppo."

Herr Wenzel Kopta.
Ruins of Athens.....Male and Female Voices.
Grand Chorus in 8 Numbers with full Orchestra.

Address by Dr. P. Unger.

Overture, "Fidelio 3rd".....Orchestra.
Quartet from "Fidelio."
"Adelaide".....Tenor Solo.
"Romanne in F-Dur".....For the Violin.
Finale from the Oratorio: "Christ on the Mt. of Olives."
Grand Chorus with Full Orchestra.

The second (Saturday) was by the Baltimore Liederkreis, Prof. J. H. Rosewald, Director, with this programme:

Overture, "Prometheus."
Oration by Rev. H. Scheib.
Crowning of the Bust of Beethoven, by the Ladies of the Liederkreis.
Meeres-Stille.....Chorus for male and female voices.
Fantasia in C minor, for Piano, with Choro. and Orchestra.
Performed by Mme. Weiller.
Adelaide. [Tenor Solo].
Mr. Maximilian Friedman.

Oratorio, "Christ on Mount Olive," including:
Recitative and Aria, for Tenor, [Christus],
Mr. Schumann.
Soprano Solo and Chorus [Seraph].
Mme. Rosewald.
Duet, Soprano and Tenor, [Seraph and Christus].
Mme. Rosewald and Mr. Schumann.
Chorus for male voices, [Warriors].
Double Chorus for male voices, [Warriors and Disciples].
Terzetto, for Soprano, Tenor and Bass.
[Seraph, Christus and Petrus].
Mme. Rosewald, Messrs. Friedman and Blitter.
Chorus of Angels.
Finale.

Christmas Oratorio,—"The Messiah."

True to the good old custom, the HANDEL & HAYDN SOCIETY performed Handel's great religious Oratorio both on Christmas Eve and on the evening of Christmas. The Saturday performance came at an inspiring hour, and yet unfortunately at the end of a fatiguing week with almost everybody, the celebration of the festival of the Nativity having become more universal with us than ever, and the preparations more engrossing. Moreover, the sudden arrival of cold Winter, after so many weeks of grace, had its chilling and benumbing influence on not a few, discouraging attendance, so that not so many were there as gladly would have been, and those who were there seemed not to be in a very wide-awake condition. (At least our Reporter had to wrestle hard with somnolence until the stand-up at the Hallelujah Chorus.) The Chorus seats were not at their fullest, so that the balance of parts was somewhat disturbed; and the orchestra, owing to theatre engagements, was smaller than desirable. But with ZERRAHN at the helm and LANG at the Great Organ, with a willing, well-trained, and strong chorus even as it was, and with good principals, the Oratorio passed off grandly on the whole. The "cuts" were few, and judiciously made. It was well that we could hear on both nights the unbroken chain of choruses, than which the work contains nothing more interesting or more finely contrasted: "Surely he has borne our grief," "And with his stripes," and "All we like sheep."

On Sunday evening both orchestra and auditorium were full, and all went with more spirit and was listened to with lively interest. Indeed we count that, as a whole, among the best performances which the Society have given of the Oratorio. Instances of faltering attack in fugued passages, or of feebly pronounced roulades, especially in the basses, were not wanting; but for the most part the choruses were sure, decided, clear, euphonious and grand, with good light and shade. The final Amen chorus, and the ringing semi-choruses, never sounded better to us; and in such involved and "catchy" pieces of counterpoint as "His yoke is easy" they were uncommonly fortunate.

There was the usual difficulty in tuning the instruments to the French pitch of the Organ, and this disturbance of the "temperament" may have been one cause of the impression some had that the contralto, Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING, sometimes sang false. We do not think it is a tendency of hers. Her voice is remarkably large and rich in quality, her reading careful and intelligent, and her style large, declamatory and impressive. Yet sometimes, we confess, her song appeared to us studied, wilful and demonstrative, rather than inspired; certain words and phrases in "He was despised" were given with exaggerated emphasis, so that you felt them less instead of more. Yet there is no denying that this lady has one of the richest and most telling voices, and is one of the really well-taught, intelligent, conscientious, earnest artists of the contraltos now available. She sang both evenings.

The Soprano Solos were taken on Saturday by Mrs. WESTON, who, but for excessive nervousness attending her almost debut, would have made a most agreeable impression throughout. Her voice and singing have refinement; a sincere musical quality and feeling make themselves felt in her pure, fresh, liquid tones. A voice of good, though not apparently great power; and a degree of execution and expression which promise none the less well that the singer is so evidently modest.

—On the second night, Mrs. JULIA HOUTON WEST, with all her wonted genuine fervor and devotion to a noble task, and with more than wonted power, sang the great Arias and Recitatives triumphantly.

The Tenor part was taken on the first night by Mr. WM. J. WINCH,—more successfully than in former efforts, yet lacking the fine, sympathetic quality for such pieces as "Thy rebuke," &c., and solid force for "Thou shalt dash them." On Sunday Mr. F. C. PACKARD took his place, and, for a first appearance in so formidable a task, made a remarkably good impression. He has a sweet, pure voice, of good power and compass, which he uses carefully and well, and he rendered all the trying music with fair execution, tastefully and with chaste expression. His manner showed both self-possession and a due respect for his task and for his audience. If we are not much mistaken, he will prove a valuable accession to our Oratorios and higher concerts. The grand Bass solos were entrusted on both nights, of course, to Mr. WHITNEY; for who else could do them better or so well? By his grand voice, and dignified, grand rendering, he bore among the chief honors. He seems in a great degree to have got the better of a certain heaviness and stiffness of delivery, as well as a certain hollowness in some of his large tones, so that he sings now with an unction and a sympathetic fervor, which, added to his other qualities, make him a very noble Oratorio singer.

Concert Record.

[Crowded out last time.]

We must make it very brief. The third SYMPHONY CONCERT (Dec. 16), opened with the second "Leonore" Overture, in C, new to Boston. Evidently a first attempt, or rough sketch towards the grandest of all Overtures, the well-known No. 3, yet extremely interesting (and for an orchestra extremely difficult). Like No. 3, it brings in Florestan's Aria almost at the beginning. It introduces the trumpet signal from without, only much less effectively phrased than in No. 3; also the crescendo of violins near the end, but with nothing like the power it finally acquired, and with the difference that it here enters before the Allegro is quickened into Presto. Moreover, those very Beethovenish, light, answering staccato phrases in the early part, where you seem to tread the air on tiptoe with expectation, are judiciously abridged in the third overture. Some passages, however, in No. 2, we think it must have cost the master severe self-denial to cut out; for instance one where the lifting syncopated theme of the Allegro is accompanied by a charming melodic figure echoed about among the reeds and flutes.—And we must add that, after reading the evidence in another part of this paper (Dec. 17), the reader will probably be convinced that the four Overtures have hitherto been wrongly numbered; that this so-called No. 2 was really the first; and that the "No. 1," so different from the others, and so much more reflective, quiet and subdued, was written two years later.

The Aria and Gavotte from Bach's Suite in D were greatly relished; the Aria, particularly, was very delicately rendered. Mozart's great Symphony in C (the "Jupiter") was also brought out satisfactorily, particularly the wonderful Andante; and even the complicated web of the Fugued Finale with four themes was made clear and interesting.

Cherubini's Overture to "Faniska"—an opera which he brought out new in Vienna in the same season that Beethoven brought out "Fidelio," (Nov. 1805)—proved a most charming novelty. Critics of that time thought it praise enough for Fidelio to pronounce it worthy of comparison with Cherubini's operas. Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's Fantasia, op. 15, gave the orchestra great work to do, and it was done, with startling power at times; while nothing could be much more perfect, both in technique and expression, than Mr. LANG's rendering of the Piano part; the broad, rich, solemn chords of the "Wanderer" melody made a profound impression. The Concert ended with the familiar, ever brilliant Euryanthe Overture, given with great spirit, and with rare delicacy in the pianissimo "ghost" episode.

Mr. ERNST PERABO's third Matinée we were obliged to lose. The programme we have already given.

The fourth and last was curiously interesting:

Serenade for four hands, op. 6, E flat major. Anton Krause.
Allegro moderato. "Romanne." Alla Marcia. Poco Adagio. Allegro. Alla Marcia. Poco Adagio. Allegro.
[First time in Boston. Arranged by Ernst Perabo.]
Prelude and Fugue, Op. 35, No. 3, B minor. Mendelssohn.
Three Biblical Sketches, Op. 95. Carl Löwe.
No. 1. Bethesda [D minor].
[First time in Boston.]
Sonata, Op. 111, C minor. Beethoven.
a) Maestoso. Allegro non troppo ed appassionato.
b) Arioso, Adagio.

Two or three of the little pieces by Krause were quite original and genial. The Mendelssohn Prelude and Fugue (not the very familiar one) was altogether enjoyable. Of the "Bethesda" sketches by Löwe we hardly know what to say, but certainly listened with interest. Mr. Perabo's performance of the last of Beethoven's Sonatas was truly wonderful. The audience parted with regret, but hoping for a return of such choice feasts in future. Mr. P. has been obliged to renounce his plan of giving a Beethoven Concert on the 17th.

The Concert for the Wounded in the Franco-German War, (Sund. eve. Dec. 4) filled the Music Hall and was a great success. The full Harvard Symphony Orchestra, under CARL ZERRAHN, played the "Leonora" and "Euryanthe" Overtures, the Aria and Gavotte by Bach, and the "Preludes" by Liszt. Mr. PAINES opened the concert fitly with his Fantasia on "Ein feste Burg" upon the Organ. The German Männerchöre (Orpheus, &c.) sang the Vaterland's songs admirably; Mr. LISTMANN played a Violin Concerto by Paganini; and Mme. JOHANNSEN made a fine impression in the scena from Der Freyschütz.

Our Beethoven Week.

The series of performances in honor of Beethoven's hundredth birthday fully realized the programme set forth in our last. All the selections were from the master's greatest works, at different periods of his creative career, and were presented in their complete form.

THE HARVARD SYMPHONY CONCERT of Thursday afternoon, Dec. 15, (fourth of the subscription series) was eagerly attended by the largest and best audience of the season, and seems to have been unanimously regarded as one of the noblest and most perfect concerts, both in matter and in execution, that ever took place in that Music Hall, which, with the fine Beethoven statue presiding in the middle of the orchestra, and its Great Organ, and its busts of great composers with their emblematic brackets, is of all places in the country the most fit for such a tribute.

The orchestra was in full force (sixty-four), and it was pleasant to see the members of the Quintette Club once more in their seats. The public rehearsal of the Tuesday before had given the fullest assurance that all would go well in the concert.

It opened with the greatest of the "Leonora" Overtures, the No. 3, in C, which was admirably rendered, with more precision, spirit, delicacy and verve than almost ever before, familiar as it is with us. The twelve first violins, the eight cellos (headed by WULF FRIES) did noble execution. The trumpet signal from without, by Mr. ARBUCKLE, was sounded to perfection. From the vantage ground of this consummate realization of an inspired plan, the hearer could look back upon the first and second overtures presented in the two preceding concerts more intelligently, and see how wonderfully the composer finally succeeded in realizing the ideal boldly and more roughly sketched in "No. 2;" here were the same ideas, but worked up with an amazing gain of beauty and of power! The gentler "No. 1" (now proved to be really No. 3), also derives new interest from the comparison with its more stirring and exciting predecessors.

The great Recitative and Aria from "Fidelio," where Leonora has overheard the foul design against her husband, with her indignant outburst: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" followed by the tender memory, the "rainbow" vision of deliverance; the beautiful apostrophe to "Hope," with the animating accompaniment of horns, (smoothly and truly played this time), and the triumphant rapturous Allegro: "I follow the inward impulse," the resolve to go down into his dungeon and save him from the tyrant's blow, was the fittest piece of vocal solo that could be selected, and Mme. JOHANSEN was the fittest woman in America to sing it, identified as she has been with the part in all the German Operas here, and an artist thoroughly genial, experienced, who knows how it should be sung, and who enters into the full spirit of it in a manner that atones for any wear and tear of voice. A younger, fresher singer would have the advantage over her in power, brilliancy, sweetness of voice, but the ripe art is better than all that,—at least for such a task: and many of the high tones which she held out were truly fine.

The Seventh Symphony came home to all with deeper power and charm than ever before; it showed that the musicians felt the spirit of the hour, and that the careful rehearsals under Mr. ZERRAHN are bearing good fruit. Joy in the highest, fullest sense pervades this Symphony; yet most critics, not excepting Berlioz, in remarking that, have seemed to take it in a sense entirely too superficial and too common, as if it were in sooth a light, careless, happy work, rising at times to glorious exuberance of spirits. But it is joy in a much deeper, nobler sense; joy that implies great depths of sorrow and of trial bravely borne, and earnest, high ideals faithfully pursued, and realized in spite of all resistance, side temptations and discouragements. It has its sublime passages, as in the Trio of the Scherzo, where in the very midst and acme of the jubilant excitement the heavens seem to open and flood all with a transcendent, holy light. And how he clings to the celestial vision, and brings it back again, and finally in a few swift, impatient chords abruptly ends it, as if to say: "What can poor mortal genius do further? How continue or improve on that? Away with it, before we spoil it!" And the same abrupt close came by the same necessity after the mysterious, wonderfully deep, solemn Allegretto, with its sad musing, and its great throbbing undertone of Contrabass heard (or felt) all through the heavenly visitation where the comforting major of the key sets in. The introduction of the whole is stately, laden with great prophecy; and the Allegro, with its ringing dactylic rhythm, traversing the world, is full of joy, but also full of higher meaning. The Finale is the most transporting, irresistible of all vigorous, triumphant movements. Some say it is not equal to the other movements! As if it ought to be, or could be equal to them! After such celestial exaltations, after being "caught up," as it were, into a life above our life, and held there so long, what could the rapt musician do more? What but rush forth in wild abandonment of spirits, and run a mad race with himself, till physical exhaustion bring relief to agony of bliss too much for a mere mortal!

The lighter selections of Part II were doubly grateful after such sustained high flights. The Andante and Adagio (Nos. 4 and 5) from Beethoven's epious music to the Ballet "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus" (The Men of Prometheus),—an early work, composed in 1800,—strains of exquisite and quiet beauty, were very delicately rendered, all the tender bits of melody from flutes and reeds being sweetly, sympathetically phrased, and the pianissimo of the strings just right, without exaggeration. It is true, Boston could not supply a harpist: but Mr. HAMANN, quietly slipping out of the ranks of the orchestra, gave a fair suggestion of the arpeggios on a piano. The tones of Mr. WULF FRIES's violoncello were very expressive in the long and by no means easy, but very beautiful obbligato aria and variations for that instrument. There is a pastoral, ideal charm in all that music.

The Choral Fantasia also is, in the best and finest sense, light music for the most part. At first it is a mere rhapsodical improvisation, as it were, full of arpeggios, for the pianist; but there is a high-strung nervous force in it, giving out flashes of great intention; and out of this careless, restless prelude the whole work develops. First the double basses steal in with an exciting motive in deep, whispered undertone; then comes the first hint of a tune, a sort of Volkslied, simple, cheerful and naive; the same almost with that of the Ninth Symphony, only with the figure reversed; this is caught up and varied by pairs of instruments one after another, with most humorous simplicity, and takes possession finally of the whole orchestra. All the while the piano-forte rules, either by open sign or silence, at the centre of the whole, flinging out splendid flashes of bravura now and then; till finally the basses begin to speak (as they do in the Ninth Symphony), the sextet of solo voices begin the hymn in praise of Harmony, and the chorus join in bearing it up through a series of noble climaxes. One or two moments near the end are really sublime; for instance the sudden entrance of an unexpected great chord in fortissimo, as in the Symphony. Every one familiar with the latter, must have recognized the first hint of its choral movement in this lighter and more sketchy work. It is truly a Fantasia, and if not one of the master's greatest works, it is one of his most genial and charming. Mr. PERABO was singularly happy in the piano part, and the vocal portions were very satisfactorily sung by a select choir of over a hundred voices from the Handel and Haydn Society, which also furnished the soloists.—We fear it will be long before we hear a better concert than that was.

Friday Eve., 16th.—The MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE Club's concert, of Beethoven's Chamber Music, was next in order. Burnstead Hall (below the Music Hall) was made available for the occasion; and the extremely tasteful and abundant decoration of the blank wall and platform down in the centre of the amphitheatre, half filled with friendly and appreciative audience, made the scene inspiring. The wreathed bust of Beethoven stood forward in the middle, flanked by busts of Mendelssohn and Mozart, and the Vienna portrait of Beethoven (an excellent copy in oil) hung upon the wall. Pleasant, too, were the faces of the Club with their assisting artists, Messrs. ELTZ, bassoon, HAMANN, horn, and A. HEINDL, double bass, as they sat down to illustrate the composer's earlier period by an excellent performance of the entire Septet, op. 20. The middle period was represented by the great B flat Trio, op. 97, played to a charm by Messrs. B. J. LARKO, piano, SCHULTZE, violin, and FRIES, cello. For the last period, the work selected was the last of all the "posthumous" string Quartettes, the op. 135, in F,—the strangest and most difficult of all, that in which the Finale bears the motto: "Muss es sein? es muss sein!" Suffice it to say, it was made much clearer and more interesting than ever before. Between those three parts, Mrs. J. W. WESTON sang, with musical voice and feeling, the "Song of the Quail," which we do not think a particularly characteristic work of Beethoven, and the first of the Mignon songs: "Knowest thou the land?" which has a singular and solemn beauty.

Saturday, 7th. The Birthday itself was marked by a performance of "Fidelio," by the English Opera Troupe, in the evening. The Boston Theatre was crowded, as on no other night. The performance as a whole was highly creditable, far better than was commonly expected. Of course, there were not a few shortcomings; but the whole thing was done so conscientiously and thoroughly, within their means, and all co-operated with such manifest respect for the task, that we cannot but respect the effort. Mrs. BERNARD gave a really noble impersonation of Leonora, the heroic wife, and Mr. CASTLE never sang so well as in the part of Florestan. Mr. DRAYTON's Rocco was genial and grand, and little ROSE HENKE made the best of Marcellinas. Nor was Mr. CHAT TERTON's Jacquino far behind. Mr. LAWRENCE lacked weight of voice and simplicity of action for Pizarro. The chorus of Prisoners was eked out by some hundred and fifty Handel and Haydn volunteers, who not only appeared frightened, but marred the scene by coming on the stage with music sheets, and not in costume. The grandeur of the finale, however, was really much heightened by such swelling of the numbers.

Monday afternoon, 19th. Combined performance, by the orchestra of the HARVARD SYMPHONY CONCERTS and the full chorus of the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY (some 500 voices), of the great "CHORAL SYMPHONY," preceded by a short First Part: 1. "Egmont" Overture; 2. Quartet from "Fidelio;" 3. Andante and Adagio, from "Prometheus," again; 4. Hallelujah Chorus from the "Mr. of Olives." We have not room to say how admirably the great Symphony was done, particularly the trying Choral Parts, and even the Quartet of Soli. Never before has it been sung so well here. Mr. ZERRAHN's Orchestra was at its best too; and the whole Concert was indeed most inspiring,—the only drawback being that the Music Hall was not crowded. Otherwise it was a noble ending of a week of worthy homage to the Master.

ENGLISH OPERA.—Too many worthy tasks were undertaken, and in some instances with marked success, to pass without notice. But our notes find no room just now.

1871. The New Year opens with good musical promise. First, next Thursday, Jan. 5, the fifth SYMPHONY CONCERT: Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark [first time]; Mozart's D-minor Piano Concerto (Miss ANNA MEHLIG); Fourth Overture to "Fidelio."—Liszt's arrangement of Bach's Organ Fugue in G minor (Miss MEHLIG); Schubert's great Symphony in C. [Public rehearsal Tuesday next, at 2 P. M.]

Jan. 7.—Testimonial to Mr. KELLER, author of so many patriotic songs. A feature on this occasion will be the first appearance of the tenor singer, Prof. CARL GLOGNER, CASTLE, recently from the Leipzig Conservatory, where he has been for some years the principal teacher of singing. The war rendering his prospects so precarious there, he has come, with warmest testimonials from the Directors of the Conservatory, to settle here in Boston, both as singer and as teacher. His school is the second Italian one of Greta, in which he made his principal studies in Paris. He is not what is commonly called a "German singer."

Next comes TROUBADOUR THOMAS back with his fine Orchestra, to give three evening Concerts and four Matinées between the 10th and 21st of January.

German Opera at Boston Theatre about the middle of the month.

Mr. B. J. LARKO has made arrangements to give four concerts at the Globe Theatre on Thursday afternoons, beginning Jan. 19, and alternating with the Harvard Symphony concerts. There will be a piano trio, a piano concerto and a string quartet at each concert.

Music Abroad.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The programme of the ninth concert added two more important works by Beethoven to the list of those previously given. No symphony was performed; the place usually occupied by a great orchestral composition being allotted to the music to The Ruins of Athens (Op. 113), which has only obtained a hearing at rare intervals, though detached movements, the Chorus of Dervishes and Turkish March, for example, are familiar. A few lines may be made to comprise the entire history of the music in question. It is Beethoven's share of a "Nachspiel mit Gesängen und Chören," in the preparation of which he was associated with Kotzebue, and the object of which was to inaugurate a new theatre at Pesth. After being employed for its original purpose in February, 1812, portions of the music were used at the opening of a Vienna theatre in 1822, in which year the "March" was first published. The overture was printed in 1823; and, as for the balance of the work, it remained in MS. till 1846. Such is the unevenful history of one of Beethoven's finest efforts at writing dramatic music. Neglect seems to pursue it with unrelenting vigor, the Crystal Palace performance being the first in London for many years, if we except an inadequate attempt at the Oxford Music Hall. Of the twelve numbers not one is destitute of great and striking merit, and concert-givers will do well to bestow occasional notice upon a work certain to repay with interest whatever attention it may receive. A better performance in some respects than that given under Mr. Mann's direction would be hard to imagine. The solos might have had more effective delivery; and the choruses were not faultless; but the orchestra atoned, and won three encores in succession, the favored pieces being the Dervish Chorus, March, and interlude of Wind Instruments. That a majority of those present are ready to welcome another performance of The Ruins of Athens may be assumed. The second work by Beethoven was his Violin Concerto in the execution of which Madame Norman Neruda displayed all the ability which has justly given her so distinguished a position. The rest of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's splendid overture, Hebrides, and a selection of vocal pieces, including Schubert's Wanderer, sung by Herr Stockhausen to Ferdinand Hiller's orchestral accompaniments.

MADAME VIARDOT. In a notice of the concert recently given at St. James's Hall in aid of the "French Refugees' benevolent Fund," the Athenæum of December 3rd speaks as follows of the celebrated artist, Madame Pauline Viardot-Garcia:—

"The great French basso was succeeded by Viardot, who sang another à propos air, as it were—Rossini's patriotic 'Pensa alla Patria,' from the Italiana in Algeri. How describe the furor provoked by the grandeur of her delivery of the recitative—by her marvellous compass in the cabaletta? Her voice is fresher than it was ten years since; in the lower notes it is decidedly richer and more sonorous. That her vocalization is such a marvel arises from the indomitable will that she plays in battling with nature, which has not endowed her with a fine organ. With her, the singing is of the heart and intellect; the voice itself is but secondary. When she has to execute one of those daring scales which she alone can invent, and in which she has to attack high notes, the effect is grating for the moment, but in the next instant there emanate thrilling tones which touch the heart. The upper part of her register she absolutely drags out, by sheer courage, and quite irrespective of the physical difficulties she has to contend with. Her glorious sister Malibran excepted, no artist can be cited who exercised such a potent spell over an auditory, no vocalist gifted with the most sympathetic of organs, and no singer possessing the faculty of florid execution to the most brilliant degree, can be quoted who have such dramatic powers as Madame Viardot. Of every style of art she is a consummate mistress; in the delivery of any graduation of sound she has never been approached; and thus it is that in the portrayal of varied emotions, she enlists the sympathies so irresistibly. In the 'Pensa alla Patria' she exhibited an elevation of style and power of declamation that raised the words to a national import, as if some patriot was striving to rouse his country to a supreme effort. In the subsequent scene from Gluck's Orphée, 'J'ai perdu mon Eurydice,' the vocalization was of another order of excellence; herein the passionate appeals of Orpheus for his lost spouse were rendered with such acute sensibility, that the emotions of many of the listeners were conveyed more by sympathetic tears than by the ordinary tokens of applause."

MR. CHORLEY writes:—"It is understood that there is a chance of our seeing one of the most remarkable impersonations of any time. This is the Orpheus of Gluck's imperishable opera, presented by Madame Viardot. Those who remember the effect of this incomparable piece of Art, as exhibited by her in Paris, will bear me out in saying that the opera, though it has been given in London, has yet to be heard and seen and felt here. The performance of Madame Czillag, when 'Orfeo' was produced under Mr. Gye's management, consequently on the remarkable effect produced by the Parisian revival, was coarse, heavy and 'untender,' in no respect to be accepted save by audiences who have never seen the great artist. I shall never forget the eloquence and enthusiasm regarding the French 'Orphée,' expressed again and again by Charles Dickens. He could not 'say enough' (to quote his own words) 'in its praise.'"

HERR PAUER'S LECTURES. The following remarks upon Herr Ernst Pauer's Musical Lectures at the South Kensington Museum, are extracted from an article in the Standard of Dec. 5:—

"The first lecture took place on the 16th, the second on the 23d ult., and the third on Wednesday last. The lectures are given for the purpose of describing the invention and gradual improvements of the harpsichord, clavichord, and pianoforte; for the explanation of terms used in pianoforte music, as well as of the various kinds of compositions known as concertos, sonatas, suites, capriccios, fugues, preludes, allemandes, sarabands, courantes, gigues, gavottes, &c. Biographical notices of some of the composers are also included. The musical illustrations introduced at the first lecture were by Byrd, Ball, Gibbons, Purcell, Scarlatti, Rameau, Couperin, and others of a similar period. At the second there were selections from Handel, Bach, and Krebs; at the third from Emanuel Bach, Haydn, Eberlin, Mozart, Haessler, and Clementi. In order to show the most influential composers for the clavichord and pianoforte since 1660, Mr. Pauer has drawn up a chronological table for Italy, France, Germany, and Great Britain. The table for Germany is extensive. That for France Mr. Pauer limits to five names, and after Rameau only two are given; so that from 1764, the date of Rameau's death, to the present time, only two composers can be mentioned—Schubert and Bertini. Italy does not fare much better. Only ten are placed on the list. Since Paradise, 1795, two only are mentioned, Clementi and Pollini. England, according to Mr. Pauer, is richer than either France or Italy. J. B. Cramer is honored with an English nationality; but Cramer was born at Mannheim on the 24th of February, 1771. The lectures are well attended by ladies, Mr. Pauer's skill as a pianist rendering them attractive. The last on Wednesday was illustrated by extracts from Dnssek, Hummel, Weber, and Beethoven."

The directors of the Oratorio Concerts have issued a capital prospectus for their approaching third season. We are promised, among other things, the following works:—Bach's Passion-Musik; Elijah; the Mass in D of Beethoven; Spohr's Calvary; a selection from Mendelssohn's Psalms, and Handel's rarely-heard Chandos Anthems; Benedict St. Peter; Hiller's Nala and Damayanti; and Smart's Bride of Dunkerron. It is evident from this that the directors aforesaid have lost none of their youthful enterprise. Looking at the supineness with which around, they "point to better things, and lead the way." May their shadow never be less! Mr. Joseph Barnby, it is needless to add, will continue in his post of conductor. Musical World.

AFTER the death of Professor Otto Jahn, of Bonn, his collection of musical works, a collection perfectly unique of its kind, was sold by auction in the month of April last. The Prussian Government, materially assisted by the liberality of Herr Killmann, of this town, succeeded in securing for the Royal Library, Berlin, the entire Mozart Collection, the most important numbers of the Haydn Collection—several from the Beethoven, and the Gluck Collection, &c. This is a very valuable addition to the Royal Library, which is now the only one in the world that possesses Mozart's entire works. It has, moreover, already obtained the rarest and most costly of Haydn's, so that in time the collection of that composer, also, will easily be completed. With regard to those works of Gluck, and those of Haydn, which are still wanting, manuscript copies may be procured at a trifling cost.

BERLIN. It was stated the other day by one of the Berlin correspondents of a contemporary that Herr Joachim had resigned his post as chief of the Berlin Conservatory of Music, and the statement has been widely circulated. It should be added, however, that the resignation of Herr Joachim was not accepted by the Minister under whose jurisdiction such artistic matters come, and that a statement of Herr Joachim's causes for dissatisfaction—the reasons, in fact, which led to his resignation—has been forwarded to King William at Versailles. Should his Majesty accept this statement as the great musician would have it understood, Herr Joachim will in all probability retain his position.—Pall Mall Gazette.

LEIPZIG. In order to render the approaching Beethoven ceremony in some degree worthy of the great master, all the musical institutions here have combined and formed the resolution to devote an entire week, during which only works by Beethoven will be performed, to the celebration of the festival. The "Beethoven Week" will commence on Sunday, the 11th inst., with a grand performance of sacred music. On Monday, there will be a performance in the Theatre; on Tuesday, chamber music; on Wednesday, performance in the Theatre; on Thursday, a concert at the Gerwandhaus; and on Friday and Saturday, a performance in the Theatre.—At the 6th Gewandhaus Concert, Herr Franz Bendel, pianist, from Berlin, made his first appearance here; but, probably because he was suffering from nervousness, or indisposition, failed to produce any very particular impression. Dr. Gunz sang the Priest's song from Die Meistersinger, by Herr R. Wagner, and songs by Schubert. Herr Bruch's second Symphony, in F minor, was very far from proving a success; the majority of the audience listened in icy silence, while some indulged in open marks of disapprobation.

VENICE. Beethoven, a drama in five acts, by Signor Pietro Cossa, just brought out at the Apollo Theatre, Venice, has according to the Gazzetta di Venezia, failed to interest the public. The drama represents the humours of a vain, egotistical and discontented nature; and throughout the five acts Beethoven wearies the audience by his selfish complaints and by his railings at society.

Oriental Lyrics.

(FOLK-SONGS.)

NAMEA. (Indian.)

Bells of silver, ringing,
Tinkle under branches slowly swinging;
Yes! it is Namea's light gazelle,
Message sweet from her, adored one! bringing.

Love no price could measure
Bound this letter-wreath, this blooming treasure
Round his slender neck, to prove how well
She loveth me, my pride, my pain, my pleasure!

Messenger flower-laden,
Bear this breathing kiss unto the maiden
Fairer than all maids on earth who dwell;—
Shall I ever reach her lips' rose-Aldoun?

Take this bud, scent-sighing,
Emblem of my passion, pure, undying;
Lay it at her rosy foot, gazelle,
Where I would I were this moment lying!

GUL. (Arabian.)

I seek not treasures that lure afar,
Nor rifle the stores of the rich bazar;
When beautiful Gul became mine own,
I gained the treasures of every zone.
When charms so exquisite met these eyes,
I thought: Gul has plundered Paradise!
For hues less brilliant than hers repose
On pink and 'ulip, lily and rose;
The crown of loveliness, dark yet bright,
She seems to my dazzled, enraptured sight;
The shining robe that her soft limbs wear,
Adorns not, but floats adorned by her.
The ruby's light, and the coral's bloom,
The glow of amber, and myrrh's perfume,
Here richly mingle in wealth untold,
Like morning blushes and morning gold;
Here finely fuse in a glorious One,
Like rays that stream from the splendid sun;
The perfect sun, and the sun's bright beams,
Light, and the fountain of light. Gul seems!

HIND. (Turkish.)

Though thou dost scorn me, Hind, beloved too well,
Eyes dark as thine there are, oh wild gazelle!
Though thou dost throw my wounded heart away,
Rose-cheeks like thine yet mock the rising day!
Then down with care! I'll seek Stamboul the bright,
Where vain chimeras all are put to flight;
There I shall find some alabaster form,
And Mauritanian lips, and wine-cups warm.
And yet, why struggle? day's o'erbrimmed with care,
And sleepless nights were mine, dwell she not there.
Ungrateful Hind! with talismanic wiles
Thou lead'st me captive to thy chary smiles!

RACHEL. (Hebrew.)

Haste, Rachel, haste; nor, trembling, longer dally;
O fly with me from envy's power, sweet maid!
Come, let us seek some green, secluded valley,
And hide within its flowering, sheltering shade!

Among the vine-clad bowers, unseen, reposing
Where earth outblossoms in wild, luxuriant pride,
Each unto each our soul-felt love disclosing,
Joy shall be ours, joy long to us denied.

There cruel eyes shall nevermore behold thee,
While Nature takes thee to her mother breast;
There heavenly peace, beloved! shall unfold thee,
And my great bliss will be, to make thee blest!

The History of Music.

SECOND LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

[Reported for the Boston Journal, Dec. 12, 1870.]

The second of Mr. J. K. Paine's series of lectures on the History of Music was delivered at Wesleyan Association Hall, Bromfield street, Saturday noon. His subject was, "The First Attempts in Harmony; Hucbald, Guido, Franco, Adam de la Hale, Troubadours and Minnesingers."

Mr. Paine said that in the middle ages the learned world was much puzzled with the question whether the ancients were acquainted with what we call harmony. Eminent scholars and musical theorists ranged themselves on opposite sides, and the controversy was carried on for centuries. The affirmative opinion was maintained by some of the most learned minds of the middle ages, and outweighed by far all contemporary opposition. In more enlightened days the negative opinion has prevailed, and such eminent musical critics and historians as Padre Martini, Forkel, Féris, Kiesewetter, Marx and Ambros have proved beyond doubt that the ancients were profoundly ignorant of harmony or counterpoint. While harmony is the chief characteristic of modern music, the Asiatic finds it disagreeable and barbarous. He has no comprehension of any other than unison music, and the sound of two or more simultaneous parts appear to him as mere noise. Niebuhr asked an Arabian how he liked European music, and received the answer: "Your music is a wild, unpleasant shouting, in which no earnest man can find any pleasure." Could a refined Greek musician, Terpander, or Arion, have listened to a modern symphony, he would probably have recognized nothing more than a confusion of sounds, void of all meaning.

We have no knowledge of any attempts to use harmonic intervals during the first nine hundred years of the present chronology. The chief progress made in this long period was in simplifying musical metre by making it more independent of the words, in arranging the compass of musical sounds into different scales, and in adopting a kind of notation. It is wholly unknown to whom the honor of making the first experiments in harmony belongs. The oldest example known of any such music is contained in the treatise of a learned monk, Hucbald, or Hucbaldus, of St. Amand, in Flanders, who lived between 840 and 930, and who was an earnest student of Greek music. Hucbald's art was to set the cantus fermus, or principal voice, in the tenor, above which he added a second voice part, singing the same melody throughout four or five notes higher; or he added a third voice to run with the upper melody in the octave beneath; or, again, four voices were used by doubling the parallel fourths or fifth, in the octave. This invention was called the Organum, and also by the ancient name Diaphonia, different sounds, and Symphonia, unison of sounds. The least objectionable kind of Organum to modern ears was the so-called Roaming or Wandering Organum. It was composed in two voices of parallel fourths, with a refreshing admixture of thirds, seconds and unisons in oblique and contrary motion. The fourth was the prominent interval. Consecutive thirds were carefully avoided.

[An example of this kind of song was given with the aid of Mr. H. L. Whitney. The effect of the dissonant combinations was, to use a mild term, horrible.]

Ambros holds the opinion that the organum was practiced by the monks as a penance for the ear, to counteract the sensuous charm of secular music by something utterly antagonistic. The name "organum" naturally suggests the belief that the first experiments in combining different intervals of sound were made through the organ. In that age organs were of the most clumsy construction. The keys were so wide that the organist used his fists or elbows in playing. Under such circumstances not more than two notes could have been held down simultaneously. Hucbald made improvements in notation by inserting between the spaces of a number of parallel lines the words to a higher or lower position in order to denote the pitch of tones, aided by the letters T and S (tonus and semitonus) placed on the margin to show whether the steps were whole or half tones. He also applied the names of the Greek scales to the church modes, but in a new order.

The speculations of Hucbald and other learned ecclesiastics of his time in regard to music did not extend much beyond the walls of the few monasteries where they passed their lives, and the practice of church music was not much influenced by the abstruse theories of scholars. Nearly a century elapsed before any new discovery appeared in music worthy of mention. Music was promoted in the eleventh century by Guido of Arezzo (1023-36), a Benedictine monk of the Convent Pomposa, near Ravenna, whose name subsequently attained a higher fame than that of any musician of mediæval times, lasting even to the present day. Guido's achievements were the improvement of notation and the simplification of teaching singing. He taught his pupils the tones and syllables from the monochord of Pythagoras, which he divided into a scale of twenty-one tones. He also fixed the number of lines on which the notes were written at four. Hitherto no given number had been followed, but they had varied from two to twenty lines. He was also the first to write the notes on the spaces as well as on the lines. Two lines were colored red and green and represented the clefs F and C, and the other lines D and A were black. Notwithstanding the great advantage gained by this simplification the many lined staff continued in use, both in vocal and instrumental music, until into the sixteenth century. Guido was not the inventor of the modern notes, as has been considered; neither did he use exclusively the points of the neuma characters, which were the foundation of the modern notes. His favorite signs of the tones were the Gregorian letters, but he also used many of the neuma characters to which he gave a definite place on the staff to indicate their pitch. The parallel lines were dispensed with when the Gregorian letters were employed, and were simply written above the text. Solmization, or the application of the syllables ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, to the various notes is attributed to Guido, who, indeed, may have adopted them, but which were not developed into a well-regulated system before the thirteenth century. These syllables were taken from the first words of a favorite Latin hymn, which served as a supposed protection against hoarseness and colds.

Neither Guido nor his immediate followers did much for the advancement of harmony. Guido has become a mythical character. He has been credited with far more honor than belongs to him. Writers, particularly those of the seventeenth century, have lauded him to the skies. He was called the restorer, nay, the inventor of music, and his predecessors and contemporaries were ignored. He was erroneously deemed the inventor of notation, harmony, the gamut, solmization, the clavichord, the hexichord and the harmonic hand, a practical aid to singers, by means of which they could count the twenty notes of Guido's scale with solmization on the fingers of the left hand.

In the history of music the twelfth century is an epoch without names; yet during this period we mark the first appearance of varied rhythm and exact measure in music, and consequently the development of the note. We owe this remarkable change undoubtedly to the increasing influence of secular music under the universal sway of the Troubadours, whose rhythmical and pleasing melody marked a strong contrast to the grave, nearly equal notes of the Gregorian song. The further growth of harmony was closely connected with this measured, melodious style, and new intervals came into practice. This resulted in a kind of counterpoint called Florid, because two or more notes were used against one as passing notes. This florid counterpoint, or Discantus (different voices), as it was called, was used first in secular music, but gradually worked its way into sacred music in spite of opposition, but it was not before the thirteenth century that it was admitted to general favor. The oldest known writer on the subject of the new notation or mensural music as it was called, was Franco of Cologne, whose treatises are supposed to belong to the latter part of the twelfth century or the early part of the thirteenth century. Franco treats of the various notes used in mensural music, of which there were four kinds with corresponding pauses. Franco's classification of the different harmonic intervals agrees in the main with that of the present day. Among the contemporaries of Franco, probably, was the so called pseudo-Beda, the unknown author of a treatise on music.

In England music has long been cultivated. Alfred the great had encouraged both the practice and science of music. He founded the Professorship of Music at the University of Oxford, in the year 886, and some writers gather therefrom that mensural music flourished in that country.

The theoretical writings of Marchettus of Padua, toward the end of the thirteenth century, followed by John De Muris, Doctor of the Sorbonne, at Paris, about 1330, note a decided progress in harmony and measure. The examples of harmony by Marchettus and De Muris do not lead us to look on them, nor the practical musicians whom they represent, as the founders of modern counterpoint, but rather as guides to the purity and correctness of its elements. De Muris, it appears, was the first musician to adopt the word counterpoint as the name for polyphonic music. Before these more correct teachings had exerted their full influence, it was the habit with clever singers to improvise parts to accompany the principal melody or cantus firmus. This was called contrapunctio a mente, or improvised Discant, and was the general practice in sacred and secular music. In church music it became so offensive to good taste that finally it had to be abolished by papal decree.

The feeble light modern historians have been able to throw on the music of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries—the age of Dante, Chaucer and Petrarch—seems to make the darkness of that period more complete. Very few specimens of early contrapuntal music have come down to us, unless they still lie buried in monastery libraries.

[An illustration of this old three-part harmony was given by Mr. Paine, with the aid of Messrs. Whitney and Rudolphsen, in the rendering of a three-voiced chanson from a musical play, entitled "Robin and Marion," written by Adam de la Hale, a Troubadour, born at Arras in 1240.]

Thus far, remarked Mr. Paine, attention had been devoted almost exclusively to the history of music in its connection with Christian worship. The first regular attempts in polyphonic music were probably made through the agency of secular melodies as manifested in the Discantus. At a later period these secular melodies were interwoven curiously and ingeniously into church compositions of the most extended and serious form; even whole masses were built on them. There are no proper evidences, but good reasons for believing that popular secular music existed in the earliest centuries of the Christian era just as it did in antiquity, but there are no specimens left to us in writing. The great migrations of the fifth and sixth centuries in Europe must have destroyed all remnants of popular song previously existing. It required a new culture of society to bring forth new fruits in verse and song. The history of national popular songs well illustrates the idea that in past ages music has been lost for want of a simple and accurate notation, whereas poetry has found a lasting record in written words from remote antiquity to the present day.

The reign of Charlemagne was productive of popular poetry and music, as is proved by the variety of songs of his day, all the melodies of which, unfortunately, are lost. The name minstrel or minestral was a title given by Pepin, father of Charlemagne, to his chapel master, and subsequently all through the middle ages the name was applied to travelling players and singers, a numerous class in Germany, France, England and Italy from the eight to the eighteenth centuries, a period of a thousand years. The few relics of secular song now at hand of a period earlier than the eleventh century are only in verse. Prior to the age of the Troubadours we are unable to judge of secular music by examples. Provençal poetry and song held universal sway in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Kings and princes rivalled each other in the profession of Troubadours. The word Troubadour comes from trobar, trouver, to find or invent. Besides these royal inventors, there was another class of Troubadours who were held in the service of royalty as court poets. The Troubadours, unlike their contemporaries, the German Minnesingers, frequently were unable to sing their own songs, and for this purpose they held in their employ minstrels or Jongleurs, who were persons skilled in singing and playing. The Jongleurs held a subordinate position, and they were sometimes compelled to play as many as nine different instruments, and to be skilled in arts of rope-dancing and tumbling, in imitating the song of birds, as well as to be of ready wit and able to joke and play the fool. Hence the name jongleur is derived from joculator, a jester. The Troubadours never sang for money, but for honor or love, while the jongleur was a paid servant. Although the minstrels are associated with all that is poetical and romantic in English literature, from Chaucer to Scott, and are supposed by some to have been the genuine successors of the ancient bards or scalds, they were in real life far less attractive. They led wild and irregular lives, wandering like Gipsies from place to place without any settled homes, and in larger or smaller parties of men, women, and children. In Germany for a long time they were held in contempt and enjoyed no rights either of church or of State. In France and England they enjoyed better treatment. In the course of time they settled down in towns and cities under the protection of some noble men. It was their custom to choose a leader who received the title of King of the Minstrels. In France there were minstrel kings as early as the thirteenth century. In England a brotherhood of minstrels existed in old times at Beverly, in Yorkshire. The Jongleurs accompanied their songs commonly on the Harp, or Rota, the Peasant's Lyre, a kind of hurdy-gurdy; and later on the Rebec, a three stringed instrument played with a bow. Besides these there were a great variety of instruments in use; as, for instance, the Vielle, or Viola, the name derived from files, a string. Fidula was the general name for stringed instruments, and if we follow the word through all its changes from fidula to vidula, videl (or fiddle), viele, viol, we reach viola, and finally at a later period its diminutive violin. Other instruments peculiar to that age were the Gigue, Sambuca, Salteire, Armonia, Muse, Chipponie and Frestale. They have long since become obsolete, and we scarcely know more of them than the mere names. The Jongleur must have played in unison with the melody in accompanying singing, unless he happened to be a little more educated than common, and then, possibly, he attempted a separate part something in the style of the Organum or Discant. The central object of Provençal poetry and music was devotion to woman. The oldest known Provençal melodies are by Chatelain de Coucy, a Troubadour of the Twelfth Century; Thibaut, King of Navarre (1201-54); Gaucelm Faidit, and Adam de la Hale.

[Another illustration of the music of this period, a song from Adam de la Hale's "Robin and Marion," was sung by Mr. Rudolphsen. As it was in unison instead of in parts, it was far more pleasing to the ear than the previous selection, being, in fact, quite modern in style.]

Italy was for a time under the influence of Provençal poetry and song. That land suffered a kind of invasion of troubadours and minstrels.

Of all other European countries Germany was most influenced by Provençal poetry, and the minnesingers and meistersingers were a similar class of lyrista, knightly poets and musicians. The German Minnelied (love song) was more earnest and tender, though less brilliant than the song of the troubadour. The minnesinger was devoted to all womankind, while the troubadour sought out a single object of his poetical passion. The minnesingers stood in closer relation to the people than did the Troubadours, counting as many of the burgher class among their number as of the order of knighthood. As the Minnesingers were usually skilled in singing and playing, they dispensed with the aid of the Jongleurs or Minstrels. Many specimens of the minne-songs have been preserved, and we are well able to judge of their characteristics. The recitative style of many of them impresses us. The metre of the words decides the length of the notes. The cadence was often marked by a freer flow of melody. The grave and serious character of the older songs reminds us of Gregorian music. Some of the later specimens are lively and modern in their tone.

[An example of the latter class of Minne-songs, addressed to King Rudolph, was sung by Mr. Rudolphsen with very happy effect.]

The poetry of the minnesingers reached its highest cultivation in the thirteenth century, and was succeeded by the poetry of the meistersingers. They were a class of singers not generally of knightly rank, but included schoolmasters, clerks and mechanics. Guilds or companies of meistersingers were organized in rich cities of Germany, with rules and regulations. Mentz was the centre of mastersinging for a time. A high school of singing was established there. In the fifteenth century it was cultivated extensively at Munich, Strasburg and Ausburg. Nuremberg was the centre of mastersinging in the sixteenth century, and it reached its culmination there under the famous Hans Sachs, the cobbler.

"While the common people sang their songs," writes Brendel, "and the educated enjoyed the strains of the Troubadour and Minnesingers, the scholastic musicians, who called themselves Cantores by distinction, worked on in their pedantic way, indifferent to the outside world. Song to them was not a beautiful art for recreation, but an object of laborious study. But the time was at hand when the idle speculations of scholastics and the mere naturalism of popular music were to be replaced by important practical results, effected by real masters in music, who were destined to work out the problem of harmony and to establish the age of modern counterpoint. This happened in Flanders in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

A Musical Tour in North Germany.

BY DR. WILLIAM SPARK.

No. 7.

[From the London Choir.]

It was a relief and a pleasure to find myself once more amongst my Hamburg friends, for, during the journey from Magdeburg, I had heard the war note sounded frequently and in a manner not always the most harmonious or agreeable. All along the line of railway excited groups of people were gathered at the different stations, discussing the probabilities of the war which had that day been declared against their own Vaterland.

In Hamburg, the excitement was intense, I went with my friends to the Exchange, always an interesting and exciting scene, when the merchants gather in thousands between the hours of one and two; but now the place was perfectly alarming from the roar of voices and animated conversation of the traders and others who thronged that immense square on the ground floor of the Hamburg change.

When I remember the different expressions made to me on that memorable day, and compare notes with the facts as they exist at present, I cannot but regard the general judgment of the Germans at that time, as having been founded on a confidence in their own powers, which was not altogether misplaced or overestimated. "Napoleon," said one, "little knows what our resources are." "We have," said another,

"tried to avoid fighting, and done our best to remove any cause of quarrel, but he will not be pacified; he will fight, and now, mein Herr, he shall have it, and in a way which he will never forget." "We are no match for him on the sea, that we know full well; still we think we know how to prevent him from coming into our ports, and our own dear Hamburg he shall not touch." How true these words were, most of us will now well know. To me, they indicated a complete change in the peaceful occupation of my tour. Up to this time it had been peace, peace, peace. It was now war, war, horrid war. Moreover, there was a little change from that kindly feeling and sentiment which I had so much admired during the first part of my journey, and I saw clearly that I must now make the best of my way back to old England; and at the close of my second day in Hamburg, I secured a berth in the well-known steamer the "Grimshy," which has since been more than once overhauled by French cruisers, and arrived in Great Grimsby early on Sunday morning, July 17. Shortly after leaving Hamburg, when off Holgoland, the passengers were greatly alarmed to sight what was said to be a French fleet, which roved, however, to be, on nearer approach, the chief ships of the Prussian navy, making their way as quickly as possible into ports where they would be safe from the attacks of their more powerful opponents.

And now, having finished my tour, I will venture to offer a few general observations on the cultivation and practice of Music in North Germany, and in what respect we, in England, differ from our Teutonic friends. I may first say that musical training throughout Prussia is regarded as an indispensable feature in the education of every child, no matter what the creed or position of their parents. In the state-aided schools, not only is part-singing regularly, systematically, and efficiently taught, chiefly from the large black music board, but partly from the cheap handbooks so plentiful throughout Germany; but to every school there are attached outside masters who impart a knowledge of playing on different instruments for fees which would be considered in England ridiculously small—too small indeed, to reward sufficiently these painstaking educators. The result of this early musical training is to be found in the fact that the whole of the people of Germany at the present time are more or less musicians. Where any particular talent for the art is shown, there are plenty of relatives and friends ready to give counsel and advice as to the best mode of developing it in the numerous schools and conservatoires which exist throughout the country, and which, be it remembered, are partly supported by government aid. But whatever course in life is marked out for the German child, there he carries with him sound elementary musical instruction which enables him both to perform and appreciate music in a way which must conduce to the advancement of the art, and the stability of its professors. Moreover, the education of the professional musician is thorough, not only for performances, but in theory and the higher forms of composition.

In this country it is often sufficient for teachers to play a few showy pieces on the pianoforte, or on any other instrument they may wish to teach. The German vocalists, too, as a rule (though we may not always admire their hard and inflexible style), are well acquainted with the theory of music, and feel no difficulty in reading at first sight complex works. There, as a rule, female teachers are not recognized, excepting as overlookers, in a matter of practice and preparation for the master's lessons. The increasing cultivation of music has brought to the surface, in the large towns of England, swarms of ill-educated, incompetent youthful teachers, of both sexes, who generally are enemies and hindrances to the progress of true art—who teach upon no artistic data—and who impart that paltry smattering of musical instruction, which develops itself in the encouragement and performance of senseless, puerile comic songs, trumpery dance music, and easy effective compositions, both sacred and secular, of no meaning, purpose, or good intent. In music, too, as in almost every other matter, the Germans are thoroughly national. We are indeed, as I have already stated elsewhere, greatly behind both the Germans and the French in that esprit de corps, that national union of purpose and interests, which help so enormously to consolidate, elevate, and prosper every good and useful undertaking. Throughout my intercourse with the German musician, I found them anxious—sometimes, indeed, too anxious—to recommend and eulogize their fellow-workers in the art. Most of our professional musicians are aware how different this matter is in our own country, so favored in many respects, and yet so sadly behind in others. In every German town great or small, there are numbers of people who live by, and upon music. Music is the necessity of the community in which they live, and it is therefore for their interest and happiness not only to agree amongst themselves, but also to emulate each other with friendly rivalry in obtaining the greatest amount of perfection in whatever branch of the art they undertake. It must be noted also, how greatly the musicians of Germany are indebted for the prosperity of music, to its recognition and encouragement by the press. Not only have they an immense number of publications of a didactic character, exclusively devoted to music, but almost every newspaper throughout Germany, apportions a considerable amount of space, in noticing musical performances of various kinds, new publications, and letters bearing upon the progress and cultivation of the art.

With a few honorable exceptions, the press of our own country give only small attention to the subject. Ordinary reporters, accomplished in other respects, but musically speaking profoundly ignorant, are constantly employed—often against their will—to write articles upon musical performances of a high character. This want of knowledge and appreciation of newspaper editors and their assistants, many of whom obtain their impressions and information from either blumptions or biased persons, is no doubt a great drawback to the progress of the art in this country. As, however, immense sums are spent by those who provide concerts and other musical entertainments, in advertising, it seems but just to expect that newspaper proprietors should give more attention to the subject, and endeavor to secure the services of a musical contributor, as is now invariably the case with the French, German and American newspapers; one who would take sufficient interest in the art, not only to write con amore but with a view to impart information and instruction.

In a previous letter, I alluded to the choral associations of Germany, as one of the greatest sources of strength in music, and I cannot refrain from reiterating my fervent hope, that the people of England will perceive that in proportion to the support and encouragement they give to their own local institutions, will the knowledge and practice of music become more general, more appreciated, and further advanced. Undoubtedly England has done much and well for music within the last quarter of a century, and every lover of the art rejoices in its increased and increasing cultivation among all classes. In proof of this, I need only refer to the numerous musical associations and societies—public and private—established throughout the length and breadth of the land, for the practice and performance of both vocal and instrumental music. The opportunities largely embraced of hearing good music excellently performed, and very often—though not so often as could be desired—at a small cost to the listener, unmistakably instance, that the love of music pervades all grades of society, and has become an indispensable element in the recreation of all classes of the people. The formation of vocal classes, and brass bands by artisans, is also a matter of much satisfaction to those who believe as I do, in the power and beneficial influence of music, as a kindly and social agent; the publication of classic works in a cheap form, the issue of several literary and other serials, devoted to the interests of music; the number of compositions frequently issued by the great publishing firms whose large establishments, together with those of the manufacture of pianos, also testify to the increasing love and practice of music; and last, but not least, the almost universal adoption of a higher style and better performance of sacred music in our churches and other places of worship; all these facts give strong and unmistakable evidence of the great progress the art has made in England of late years, and which would be increased to a much larger extent, could we be sufficiently wise to derive those lessons of profit and instruction which assuredly are to be learnt from the experiences of our more artistic European neighbors, especially from those whom I have more particularly specified in the letter I now conclude.

German Versus Italian Music.

In an interesting article in the "Contemporary Review," on "Music and Morals," Mr. H. B. Haweis traces by contrast the different emotional influences of the three principal European schools of music. To Germany he awards the palm. Italian music he regards as having been in a decadence for the last 150 years. "We cannot stop to inquire," he says, "whether it was the rapid decline of the Papal power, and consequently of the Roman Catholic faith, which caused the degradation of Italian music; or whether, when sound came to be understood as a most subtle and ravishing minister to pleasure, the temptation to use it simply as the slave of the senses proved too great for a politically degraded people, whose religion had become half an indolent superstition and half a still more indolent scepticism; certain it is that about the time of Giambattista Jesi, (Pergolesi), who died in 1733, the high culture of music passed from Italy to Germany, which latter country was destined presently to see the rise and astonishing progress of symphony and modern oratorio, whilst Italy devoted itself thenceforth to that brilliant bathos of art known as the "Italian Opera." We cannot deny to Italy the gift of sweet and enchanting melody. Rossini has also shown himself a master of the very limited effects of harmony which it suited his purpose to cultivate. Then why is not Rossini as good as Beethoven? Absurd as the question sounds to a musician, it is not an unreasonable one when coming from the general public, and the only answer we can find is this. Not to mention the enormous resources in the study and cultivation of harmony in which the Germans revel and which the Italians, from want of inclination or ability, neglect, the German music is higher than the Italian, because it is a truer expression, and a more disciplined expression of the emotions. To follow a movement of Beethoven, is in the first place, a bracing exercise of the intellect. The emotions evoked, whilst assuming a double degree of importance by association with analytic faculty, do not become enervated, because in the masterful grip of the great composer we are conducted through a cycle of naturally progressive feeling, which always ends by leaving the mind recreated, balanced, and ennobled by the exercise.

"In Beethoven all is restrained, nothing morbid which is not almost instantly corrected, nothing luxurious which is not finally raised into the clear atmosphere of wholesome and brisk activity, or some corrective mood of peaceful self-mastery, or even playfulness. And the emotions thus roused are not the vamped-up feelings of a jaded appetite, or the false, inconsequent spasms of the sentimentalist. They are such as we have experienced in high moods, or passionately sad ones, or in the night, and in summertime, or by the sea; at all events, they are unfolded before us, not with the want of perspective, or violent frenzy of a bad dream, but with true gradations in natural succession, and tempered with all the middle tints that go to make up the truth of life. Hence the different nature of the emotional exercise gone through in listening to typical German and typical Italian music.

"The Italian makes us sentimentalize, the German makes us feel. The sentiment of the one gives the emotional conception of artificial suffering or joy; the true feeling of the other gives us the emotional conception which belongs to real suffering or joy. The one is stagey—smells of the oil and the rouge pot—the other is real, earnest, natural, and reproduces with irresistible force the deepest emotional experience of our lives. It is not good to be constantly dissolved in a state of love-melancholy, full of the languor of passion without its real spirit—but that is what Italian music aims at. Again, the violent crises of emotion should come in their right places—like spots of primary color with wastes of grey between them. There are no middle tints in Italian music; the listeners are subjected to shock after shock of emotion—half a dozen smashing surprises, and twenty or thirty spasms and languors in each scene, until at last we become like children who trust their hands again and again into water charged with electricity, just on purpose to feel the thrill and the relapse. But that is not healthy emotion—it does not recreate the feelings; it kindles artificial feelings, and makes reality tasteless. Now whenever feeling is not disciplined, it becomes weak, diseased, and unnatural. . . . It is because German music takes emotion fairly in hand, disciplines it, expresses its depressions in order to remove them, renders with terrible accuracy even its insanity and incoherence in order to give relief through such expression, and restores calm, flinches not from the tender and the passionate, stoops to pity, and becomes a very angel in sorrow: it is because the German music has probed the humanities and sounded the emotional depths of our nature—taught us how to bring the emotional region, not only into the highest activity, but also under the highest control—that we place German music in the first rank, and allow no names to stand before Gluck, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Spohr, Mendelssohn, and Schumann. It would not be difficult to show in great detail the essentially voluptuous character of French music, and the essentially moral, many-sided, and philosophical character of German music. Let not the reader suppose that in the schools of music that take rank after the German school, there is nothing worthy and beautiful to be found. Rossini, and even Verdi, are manifestly full of extraordinary merit; the veteran Auber is a real musical giant; and M. Gounod is surely a very remarkable genius." But these belong not to the giant-world of the Germans.—Weekly Review.

Beethoven.

[Extracts from the Oration by Rev. ROBERT LAIRD COLLIER at the Centennial Celebration in Chicago, Dec. 17, 1870.

The spirit of Beethoven will come to you in these days of centennial festivity, not through my inadequate words of appreciation, though they be words intended as the vehicle of admiration and love, but rather through his own weird and far-away reaching measures. Indeed, I only essay to do somewhat to bring his intellectual personality and the time-table of his earthly sojourn into view.

His life, his deepest, realest life, that which alone was life to him, and of whose fullness we all receive, is too sacred and now too celestial for the vocative case; he must be addressed, as he addresses us, in the language too liquid for words—that dilation of thought into sentiment whose only fitting symbol is music. The altitude of this spirit is such that we can reach unto it only by the suggestions of sentiment—certainly not wholly by the appreciation of our intellects. This will find expression not in my straitened and halting words, but that divine and universal language, which his great and genial countryman and contemporary, Jean Paul, beautifully, as was his wont, calls

"The real moonlight in every gloomy night of life."

Nature, our good mother, has seldom smiled more graciously upon our race than in her gift to the world of this well-beloved son. And he, in turn, comforted himself with the instinct and habit of nature; for he was a singer rather than a singer. Like nature, too, he never let fall the full secret of his powers; but was a suggester of the world beyond, and which can only be revealed in the fullness of time.

Beethoven was born in Bonn, on the Rhine, and died at Vienna, and it was fitting alike to his genius and career that his day of welcome should have fallen in December, and his day of adieu in March. He came when the earth was dreary, and went himself to repose when nature was disporting herself in lightnings and thunderings and storm.

In this interval between his first day in 1770, and his last day, in 1827, a deep monotone of spiritual sadness was the weird cord upon which all included days were strung.

And one New Year's, John, who had become possessed of some wealth, sent his card to his noble brother, as if to mortify and tantalize him: "John van Beethoven, Land Owner." Beethoven returned it: "Ludwig van Beethoven, Brain Owner."

Domestic sorrows and disquietude came like billow upon billow, and, when deep was calling unto deep, his father still dissipated, his brother still exasperating, his nephew, now his ward, through long and vexing litigation, still reckless and ungrateful—the last link binding his heart to home, a link which in itself was the very heart of home, was severed. His mother rested in death; and, as if the fates had ordained that the clouds portentous should have no silver linings, the great personal disappointment and grief of his life settled upon his soul; that sense most needful to him was deadened, and his deafness became an incurable complaint. Yes, complaint, rather than malady, for, though he strove to know the peace of resignation, he never was reconciled to the prison house into which this confined him. What untold depths of despondency attended him! The shadow thrown athwart his path wherever it led when the necessity occurred, and it was constantly re-occurring, that he must say, "Speak louder; shout—I am deaf." That faculty which was in an outward way most to him became least to him. A flute in the distance, and its tone of molten silver, its soft gray dying out and rising into an inexpressible purple of feeling, and he heard it not! The song of the shepherd, and his ear closed to it! But I am persuaded that our good mother nature had not forgotten to be gracious to her favored child; not with a seeming, but significant bonignity, she came and closed his outer ear to the coarser sounds of earth; jealous she was of his inner spiritual ear, to which, with gladness, she revealed her secrets of sound and harmony. For his music, not less than himself, was in fullest sympathy with every living thing. Nature never had a more trustworthy confidant than he.

He was passionate and excitable; this temperament is the birthright of genius. Culture puts the bite in the teeth of such natures, and the champing is what the world calls master-strokes of genius.

Beethoven poured a new spirit of life into the forms of music, and is the foundation—nay, the very ground—in which the foundation of a new order of music is laid. He clothes religion itself in a possible language, to express which speech, by its very formality, is inadequate. Forced from society, its evanescent and mutable fashions had no influence upon his music; so it is divine, in that it is not the voice of a time, but all time; not of a people, but all people. Finally, nature, by her own habit, sanctions the method of the singer. She never brings her messages in words, for words divide the world, as do boundary lines, into nations, each speaking a different language. So, too, the voice of music is universal. The German text is a confusion to the unfamiliar English eye, but the notes of the German staff are the notes of the English staff. The forms of music are the same the world over, wherever the spirit of music has taken to herself forms. Her voice is the symbol of unity and brotherhood. Civilization has its criterion in this, that it advances as man passes from the rigidity of thought and its formal statement to the relaxation of sentiment, and its glow in art and song. So this gives hope of the reunion of the now dismembered race, when sentiment shall bear sway and music shall be its speech. The Rhine shall not divide nor the channel separate, neither shall the great ocean be broad enough to keep asunder continent from continent. We shall be one people, with one language in all the earth. Beethoven was a republican, and liberty shimmered through all his nature, and floats afar out upon all the weird measures and marvels of his music. The calendar of a century closes to-day over his name, and the genius of freedom for which it stands is the magic wand uniting the New America to the old Germany.

The oration was received with great enthusiasm.

Musical Correspondence.

FRANKFORT, DEC. 12, 1870.—I suppose that if there was one thing more than another which, twenty years ago, I should have looked forward to, as among the greatest pleasures of life in Europe, the one thing almost unattainable and unapproachable in our country, it would have been the opportunity of seeing and hearing its Art; and, to bring it down to a single point, its theatres and music. Yet, now I am here, I think it is the very one thing that makes me most at home, that reminds me most of home; so greatly, as it seems to me, have we bridged over the great gulf that separated us twenty years ago from the perfection that was to be found here.

To go back to the first of my musical experiments. In Liverpool, I went to St. George's Hall to hear the Great Organ of that city, played by Mr. W. T. Best, who is reputed to be one of the very best of English performers. I found the hall scarcely larger and not so beautiful as our own Music Hall; by no means so well arranged for convenience of public performances, and still less to be commended for its acoustic properties. Its deep galleries are by no means to be compared to our balconies, where no sound is buried; while the marble (or marble seeming) columns, that so beautifully ornament the hall, at the same time make at least one-half of the gallery seats only fit for the pupils of a blind asylum. The programme of Mr. Best was as miscellaneous as any one could desire.

Overture to the Drama "Preciosa".....Weber.
Serenade, "When the Moon is brightly shining," Mollne.
Prelude and Fugue, C minor.....Bach.
Organ Sonata, No. 1, F minor.....Mendelssohn.
Allegro moderato. Adagio. Andante recitativo. Allegro assai.
Adagio Religioso, for the Organ.....Gounod.
Marche Cortège, Les Huguenots.....Meyerbeer.

The performance was brilliant and masterly, and the organ a very noble one; but if I shut my eyes, I could easily imagine myself at home again, listening to Willcox in the Music Hall, for it was exactly the kind of programme that our organist can give so beautifully, and I could not but prefer the Boston organ, for beauty of tone and general fine effect, to that of St. George's Hall.

Then I tried the London theatres, Drury Lane and Covent Garden, neither of which compares favorably with our American theatres in beauty of architectural effect, in convenience of arrangements for spectators, in lighting, or in cleanliness. Only in one particular are they better,—in the convenient access to those who come in carriages, under a covered way to the very door. If I were to begin to enumerate the multitudinous extortions that await you, from the time you get your ticket till the time you get safe home again,—for booking your places, for showing you where they are, for a programme or libretto, for your coat, your umbrella,—I do not know when I should end. The door-keeper takes your ticket which has no coupon for the number of your seat, which you may get or may not. The entrance fee is high, and the inconveniences and manifold extra charges burdensome and annoying. Boucicault was engaged in ventilating some of these things in the London papers, and commending our American ways and prices to the London managers. There is no doubt he was right.

At Covent Garden there was a fall season of Italian Opera. I heard the Zauberflöte, Trovatore and Lucrezia Borgia, Titiens singing the feminine rôles in all of them. She is deservedly an immense favorite in London, where they can never tire of worshipping her as they did Grisi, whom she much reminded me of. Her voice shows that she has passed the zenith of her powers, but her noble style and fine dramatic talent entitle her to stand at the head of modern singers.

The contralti were Trebelli-Bettini and Scalchi, the latter being, I think, the best representative of Asucena whom I have ever seen. The operas were generally no better done than I have sometimes heard them at home; the choruses were no better, neither were they better put on the stage. The orchestra, however, was magnificent, and such as we have never had in opera, whatever may have been the promises of Maretzek, Strakosch or Grau. So that on the whole I felt much at home in the theatres, finding no such great difference as would have been observed some years ago. The familiar face of Arditi, at the conductor's desk, brought back the old days of our first acquaintance with Italian opera, very pleasantly and vividly.

Neither was I unduly moved by the monster concerts of the Crystal Palace, for the four thousand singers and two hundred players, well as they sang, were not to be compared to the ten thousand voices and thousand instruments that were heard at the Jubilee in our Coliseum. But the wonderful building is beyond all praise for its beauty and its size, so vast indeed that, besides the space where the twenty thousand hearers of this Concert of National War Songs were seated, there are two theatres where performances could be carried on, at the same time, without interfering with each other. Indeed, the sound of this great chorus was all but lost in the distance when one went to the extreme end of the Palace. I was glad to hear at this time the "Wacht am Rhein," whose strains are ringing all over Germany and all through the ranks of her conquering armies in their march through France, this very day sung by four thousand voices; it was an inspiring and noble air. The composer, Carl Wilhelm, was lately hunted up in some obscure little town, and made the recipient of a great ovation in Berlin. His long forgotten song was happily remembered by some one at this time, and the poor country music master awoke one day, like Byron, to find himself famous.

So, neither by monster concerts have I been astonished beyond due limits, by what I have heard on this side of the water. One more experiment I have tried in this city. I enclose the programme of a "Symphony" Concert that I heard here. It does not look greatly unlike a programme of the Harvard Musical Association Concerts, does it?

Symphonie No. 4, in D moll (Introduction, Allegro, Romanze, Scherzo und Finale, von R. Schumann.
Arie aus der Oper "Jenny Lind," von L. Spohr, gesungen von Fräulein Elisabeth Aré-Lallemant aus Lübeck.
Concert für Pianoforte in Es-moll, componirt und vorgetragen von Herrn Capellmeister Carl Reinecke aus Leipzig.

Liedervortrag von Fräulein Aré-Lallemant:
a. Kleine Blumen, kleine Röschen, von L. van Beethoven.
b. Mein Schatz ist auf der Wandschaft, von Rob. Franz.
c. Frühlinglied, von F. Mendelssohn.
Solostücke für Pianoforte, vorgetragen von Herrn Capellmeister Reinecke:
a. Lied ohne Worte, No. 1, in E-dur, von F. Mendelssohn.
b. Marcia gloriosa, von Ferdinand Hiller.

c. Am Springbrunnen, von R. Schumann.
Fest-Overture, von Carl Reinecke (neu). Unter des Componisten eigener Leitung.

Strangely enough, I felt more at home here than ever. The hall, a real music hall, is not quite so large as ours, while the orchestra was somewhat larger, and, both in detail and in its general effect, a great deal better than ours;—Thomas's more resembles it in the excellence of performance of individual members, and in general artistic effect. Yet there was no such difference as would have been observed twenty years ago, between a German and an American orchestra, the differences that exist being such as would be noted perhaps by one critically inclined, rather than obvious to the ordinary listener. The audience, too, was very like our Boston ones, made up of the best people of this wealthy and beautiful city. The Schumann Symphony was splendidly played, and to me was new. This concert was especially interesting to me from the appearance of Reinecke, the Leipzig conductor, of whom we have heard a good deal. You will see by the programme that he appeared this evening as pianist, as composer and as conductor, and I must say that he seemed equally excellent in either capacity. I should say that no one of our resident pianists is superior to him; as a conductor, he seemed fully equal to the requirements of the place, and to infuse something of his own feeling into the orchestra under his control, who, I fancied, were moved to greater efforts under his lead, than under that of their regular conductor. As a composer, his piano Concerto interested me more than the Festival Overture, which concluded with the introduction of the march from "Judas Macabæus," I think; but both were interesting, and in themes and in their instrumentation proved him to be a man of no ordinary acquirements. Why can we not get some such man in Boston, who, by his own undeniable eminence, should be able really to be above those whom he conducts, and to be in some sort an inspiration to them? We have conductors who are not composers, composers who cannot lead an orchestra, and pianists who are neither the one nor the other; a man who, in his own person, combined the accomplishment of all these, would be a real acquisition to us.

In St. Catherine's Church here I heard an organ concert, for the benefit of wounded soldiers, by Dr. Volckmar, whose name is familiar to organists. The organ of the church is a very fine one, and the performance very brilliant and masterly. The programme was almost wholly, however, of his own compositions, which at last became slightly tedious; for an organ programme, more than any other, requires variety in style and school to make up for the monotony of the sound of the instrument itself, of which after a long time the ear wearies.

At this theatre I have heard Figaro's Hochzeit Martha, and some other operas admirably given, by what I conceived to be the regular company, without stars. Mile. Desirée Artot, a somewhat noted French singer, has just finished an engagement here, but, in a single hearing, I was not especially pleased with her, indeed preferring some of the vocalists of the regular company of the theatre. Here, too, the orchestra is admirable.

This week various performances will be given of concert, opera and oratorio, in commemoration of the centennial birthday of Beethoven, of which I may have something to report.

The only music that has been really new to me in the excellence of its performance, has been the Cathedral music of the English church, and especially as I heard it at Chester, where the service of every day was performed with a beauty that I have nowhere heard approached in America, and not equally at Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's or the Temple Church. Both voices and general style were infinitely better in the remote rural cathedral of Chester. I have always considered this English service to be the most beautiful and impressive of religious services, and now like it better than ever before. w.

DEC. 19, 1870.—Since I wrote you a few days ago, there has been a sort of Beethoven Commemoration here, very much the same as was arranged for Boston. The war seems to have put an end to any arrangements that had been proposed for any festivals on a great scale, such as, but for this, would doubtless have been given in honor of the hundredth anniversary of the great master's birthday. However, every musical organization here, as with us, has in its own way observed the day, or come as near to it as practicable. The first concert in order of date was that of the Rühl'scher Gesang-Verein, given in the fine music hall of which I wrote you last week. This is a Choral Association, numbering somewhere about 40 voices on each part, the orchestra being the large and very excellent orchestra of the theatre. The performance was preluded by a Prologue, spoken by Herr Zademack, the principal tragedian of the theatre, which was finely delivered, and received with much applause by the audience, who could better judge of its merit than I. The platform was decorated with flowers, and the master's bust crowned with a golden wreath was placed in front. This was the programme: "Overture to Coriolan"; "An die ferne Geliebte," Liederkreis, gesungen von Herrn H. Vogl; Missa in C-dur." The overture was finely given by the orchestra, which is much larger than our Harvard orchestra, numbering, I should say seventy-five or eighty. The songs, "An die ferne Geliebte," were most exquisitely sung by Vogl, who, according to the programme, is a royal court opera singer from Munich. I think I have never heard German songs so beautifully rendered. His voice is an admirable tenor, and the feeling and expression with which he gave the songs were beyond all praise. He also gave the tenor solos in the Mass which followed, and made the second part of the concert. The other solo parts were by Fräulein Louise Thomas, and Frl. Oppenheimer, the latter of whom I had heard in Opera as Nancy in "Martha." She is also an excellent oratorio singer, pleasing me more than the soprano, her voice being much more sympathetic. The choruses were admirably given. Every body really sang, and sang with expression and feeling, seemingly with one thought and one expression, and it seemed to me that the volume of sound, in a hall not much smaller than ours, was fully as great as that coming from our Handel and Haydn Society. As I listened I could not but wish that our Society would some time try the experiment of a performance given by perhaps fifty singers on each part, selected from the whole Society. Judging from this Association I am sure the result would be a success. Our voices are as good as these, and our singers can sing as well, but their merits are covered and lost and buried in a mass of dummies and donothings. It is needless to say that the singers from the theatre treated the music in a very different way from that in which our opera singers go through a concert of sacred music, evidently deeming it worthy of their best efforts, instead of merely using it to fill up a hiatus in the week's performances. I observe that the people in the best seats here, in concerts and at theatres, like our own more showily attired people, consider it their privilege to go out before the performance is quite at an end.

Next in order, on the 16th, came the Museums-Concert in the same place, with the following programme:

Overture, op. 124, in C-dur.
Concert für violine, op. 61, by Herr Concertmeister Hugo Hermann.
Kyrie, Sanctus und Benedictus aus der Missa Solemnis, op. 123.
Fantasie für P. F., Chor. und orch. op. 80.
Pianoforte, Herr Capellmeister Martin Wallenstein.
Symphonie in C-moll, No. 5, op. 67.

You will admit that this was a good programme, and I can assure you that it was well performed, though, except in the choral parts, it was not greatly better than our own best concerts. I mean the exceptionally good ones, such as we sometimes have.

Neither the orchestral nor the instrumental solos were on this occasion better than we not unfrequently hear in Boston; but the Choral Fantasia, which was given by the Cæcilien-Verein, was sung in a manner unapproachable by our societies, as they are now made up. This organization, too, was only of some forty voices on a part, who all sang as if each individual felt competent to do the whole of it; nobody hesitated or feared to attack the most difficult intervals of this by no means easy music. The solos were given by the same persons who sang with the other society.

Then on the 17th, Fidelio was given at the theatre, which was crowded, as were all the concerts, many being turned away from the doors. The opera was admirably given, and one can never tire of this glorious music. Florestan, Colomann Schmidt; Leonore, Fabbri; Rocco, Dettmer; Marcellina, Labitzki. These all entered into their work with the enthusiasm that we would expect from German singers on such an occasion, and though none of them were great singers, all were so thoroughly possessed by the spirit of the time, that the performance was one of much interest to me. The care with which these German singers enter into the mere business of the stage, in addition to the conscientious fidelity with which they render the music, is very refreshing after long being accustomed to the nonchalance that marks the performances of the Italian vocalists. They never forget that they are acting as well as singing, and though the appointments of the stage are old and the scenery shabby, no detail is overlooked in the action of the performers. The theatre, though so much smaller, reminds me of the Boston Theatre as it was at first, when it was of a deep red color, and the arrangements are more agreeable than those of the London theatres. The hours of evening performances are early here, as they begin at 6½ or 7, ending always by 9, when the day seems to close here. After the opera, the Leonora overture was splendidly given by the orchestra, the curtain rising again and showing the stage converted into a bower of blooming roses, of which column after column rose in beautiful perspective. In the middle of the stage on a pedestal, wreathed with flowers exquisitely arranged, was placed the bust of Beethoven crowned with a laurel crown. On this beautiful decorative tribute the eyes of the audience were fixed during the playing of the overture, which closed the performance.

If I had known of any special celebration of the day at Bonn, I should have been strongly tempted, being distant only a few hours' journey, to have gone there on the birthday of the great composer, and have made it a real red letter day in my musical calendar. But failing to accomplish that, I was glad to have heard at this time performances so various in kind, and so excellent in character as these which I have attempted to report to you. A concert of chamber music I was unable to attend, which would have completed the list. w.

Music in New York.

The second PHILHARMONIC CONCERT (last Saturday evening) had the following programme:

Symphony, "Ocean".....Rubinstein.
Concerto for Piano, C minor, first movement...Beethoven.
Mr. Richard Hoffman.

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini.
Barcarole from the fourth Piano Concerto, W. S. Bennett.
Overture, "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.

The Tribune says:

Rubinstein's Symphony does not belong to that bastard order of compositions called "programme music," which need a page of description to explain what they are vainly attempting to imitate,—as if music had no higher aim than to reproduce the sounds of nature, or to describe, by inarticulate notes, scenes, and sentiments which can be much better expressed in written language. . . . If we are asked what are the leading ideas suggested by this Symphony, we answer, immensity and irresistible force. Both these are indicated with wonderful distinctness in the first movement (allegro maestoso), wherein a rather simple theme is treated with admirable breadth, and wrought into a sweeping fortissimo passage worthy of one of the old classical composers. The second movement (adagio), opening with a graceful duet between the strings and reeds, and the sobers, wherein the lively measure gives place for a time to a few slow and almost mournful phrases, are distinguished for clear and spontaneous melody. The final allegro con fuoco embodies some of the most powerful writing and richest instrumentation in the whole work. Here the idea of repressed force, which has all along been occasionally perceptible, seems to get the mastery; and as, when the terrors of nature show their full power we are taught to look above for safety, the symphony reaches its climax in an adaptation of Luther's choral, "A Stronghold is our God"—not tranted, indeed, with very marked strength, but most ingeniously and strikingly introduced. The work, as a whole, leaves an excellent impression. Its effects are attained by thoroughly legitimate means, and in forcible, compact, and distinct writing we know of few compositions of the modern school to compare with it. We need hardly say (the work being Rabinstein's) that the harmonies are superb, and that the handling of the different components of the orchestra affords a noble study.

There is little to be said about Mr. Hoffman's playing except what we have so often said before, that in technical accuracy, in refinement, and in grace, it is almost without a blemish. He is one of the best American interpreters of Beethoven's piano music, and he gave the first movements of the G-minor concerto deliciously. Even better than this, however, was his playing of the lovely Barcarole of Sterndale Bennett's—one of the most exquisitely delicate bits of execution that we ever heard on a piano. He was recalled after it, and played a little piece—we believe his own—conceived in a somewhat similar spirit.

The CHURCH MUSIC ASSOCIATION gave the first concert of its second season at Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 4. The Sun says:

It was as fully attended as any of the previous ones, and as enjoyable. Haydn's third mass was sung. The chorus exhibited a marked improvement over their last year's performance, singing the somewhat difficult fugued passage of the "Quoniam" with much steadiness. They also sang with more confidence and fullness of tone than at the rehearsals.

The music to Von Weber's musical drama "Freischütz" was also given. It was ineffective because of its interjectional character and its lack of continuity. In its place in the drama it certainly is very charming, though even in that form it has had little success out of Germany—the English versions not having met with any special favor.

It is not as strong as Von Weber could write, but there were many in the audience who were glad of the exceptional opportunity to hear it.

Mme. Anna Bishop-Schultz, Mrs. Kempton, and Messrs. Leggett and Danks were the soloists.

In everything that Mme. Schultz sang she showed how excellent had been her training. If the voice has somewhat failed, we may still admire the artist. Mrs. Kempton's singing is marred by that tremulousness of tone that is so frequent, so fatal, and we regret to say so fashionable a vice. Probably the delusion that singers cherish is that this vibration suggests pathos; but while this may in rare instances be the case, the excessive use of the tremolo commonly suggests weakness of voice and the inability to sing a steady tone.

On the whole the Society is to be congratulated on its manifest progress.

Of the performance of the "Messiah," on the 26th ult., by the HARMONIC SOCIETY, the Independent says:

Although the chorus was rather more correct than usual, yet, so meagre was it in number (about 100), so indifferent was the orchestra, and so cold and small was the audience, that the entertainment, upon the whole, was dispiriting. Miss Brainerd and Miss Hutchings, who sang the soprano and alto solos, have a well-deserved celebrity in their respective parts; but neither was on this evening in her best voice. Mr. Simpson sang the tenor solos very well. Mr. Jewett, who took the bass, showed improvement since his last appearance in oratorio, though he was unequal to the severe exactions of the noble music of "The Messiah." Prof. Ritter, who had been the conductor of the society for several years past, suddenly resigned a short time ago, and the performance on the 26th was consequently given under the baton of Dr. James Peck. To this gentleman we must probably attribute a gross piece of impertinence to the memory of Handel, which has aroused a great deal of indignation among musicians. Dr. Peck undertook to reconstruct "The Messiah," by altering the sequence of the numbers in the second part, so as to finish with the "Hallelujah" chorus; although his plan involved several other changes beside this. Now, Handel wrote his great work with a most religious observance of the meaning of the text, so as to present a complete synopsis of the history of the Saviour, beginning with the prophecies of his coming, touching upon his life on earth, the establishment of his Church, and the great mystery of death and resurrection, and closing with the song of the redeemed in Heaven—the song which the Apostle, in his vision, heard the blessed spirits chanting to the Lamb that sitteth upon the throne. To each of these chapters Handel gave music of a distinct and appropriate spirit; and a musician who cannot appreciate the difference in the character of the songs and choruses, the progressive development of the idea, from the overture to the amen, must have unusually blunt perceptions of art, as well as an astonishing lack of sympathy with the text. Some of the sequences which result from Dr. Peck's arrangement are ludicrous. He puts death after the resurrection, and the rejoicing over the establishment of Christ's kingdom on earth (that is, the Church, as Handel understood it) comes long after the final triumph of the elect in Heaven. It does not seem to us that as a musical "sensation"—quite apart from any consideration of the meaning of the text—the new arrangement is the slightest improvement upon the old. Handel was an admirable judge in such matters; and Dr. Peck is not the man to review the great master's decisions. We are aware that a story was once current to the effect that the "Hallelujah" was originally intended to be the final chorus, and that Handel made it change places with "Worthy is the Lamb" because he found that the interest of the second part was flagging; but this intrinsically improbable tale has been completely refuted. The original MS. score shows that the "Hallelujah" has always stood just where it stands now.

DEATH OF CARLANSCHUETZ. This well-known musical director, who has long been identified with numerous operatic and musical enterprises in New York and other localities in this country, died yesterday morning, after a long and painful disease. He was born in 1813 in Coblenz, and was consequently fifty-seven years of age at the time of his death. He was a pupil of his father, Joseph Andreas, a Government official at Coblenz, and of F. Schneider, an eminent composer in Dresden. He was the composer of several musical works; among others a composition entitled "The Mass," and in musical circles he was considered an authority on musical matters. He first made his appearance in this country in 1857 with Imprimario Ullmann, and was subsequently identified with the operatic undertakings of Grau, Maretzke, Grover, and with the Patti, Ullmann and Batemann concert troupes. Of late years he has been engaged as the director of Philharmonic concerts, and before his health began to fail founded and conducted a conservatorium of music. The people of nearly every large city of the United States have seen Anschütz acting as a director of one or the other operatic troupe, and in musical circles, as well as among a vast number of private and professional friends and acquaintances, his decease will be sincerely regretted.—*N. BOSTON, JAN. 14, 1871.

Fifth Symphony Concert.

The largest audience of the season availed itself of the feast provided by the Harvard Musical Association on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 5. The orchestra, in full numbers (65 instruments), and in excellent condition, did good justice to the following programme:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....	Goldmark.
Piano-forte Concerto, in D minor.....	Mozart.
Allegro. Romanza. Allegro assai.
Fourth Overture to "Fidelio" ("Leonore"), in E. Op. 72, (Composed 1814).....	Beethoven.
Organ Prelude and Fugue, in G minor, arranged for the Piano-forte by Liszt.....	Bach.
Missa Anna Mehlig.
Symphony, in G. No. 9.....	Schubert.
Introd. and Allegro. Andante con moto. Scherzo. Finale.

With the exception of the Symphony, all of these selections figured for the first time in these concerts; and the Overture by Goldmark, a young Hungarian composer (we are told) yet living, was wholly new to Boston. It had been heard with favor in a New York Philharmonic concert a year or two since, and that, we believe, is all that has been known so far of Goldmark in this country. For an Overture, the work is very long; likewise very large, full, crowded in its harmony and instrumentation; very loud and overwhelming in its climaxes, after the modern way of Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz; while in the gentler and melodic traits you think of Gounod and of "Les Preludes." It hath a story to it, so the Advertiser tells us,—a Hindoo legend, "the interest of which turns on the losing and finding of a magic ring. A king has wooed and won Sakuntala, and gives her a betrothal ring of magic powers. The course of true love does not run smooth, and among the many trials to which she is subjected is the loss of this ring, which slips from her finger and sinks in the river while she is washing her hands. With the ring departs from her all memory of her former life. Sakuntala wanders in the forests in utter loneliness and forgetfulness. The ring is fortunately hooked up by fishermen and restored to her royal suitor, who finally discovers his wandering love, replaces the ring, and all ends happily."

To this story we must look, we suppose, for the method and progress of the work, rather than to intrinsically musical development. In other words, such form as it has is not purely musical, developed from within, from musical ideas and motives, but is borrowed from without, from a tale or poem; hence it is open to the objection of all modern "programme music": that of pursuing novelty, "originality," beyond the proper sphere and element of music. Such restless enterprise bespeaks ambition, rather than the real genial creative power. Genius stays at home, producing in old forms such miracles of beauty as these bold adventurers have never yet been able to bring back. (See one such miracle in the great Schubert Symphony which made the last and great impression of the concert). That Goldmark's Overture is interesting, that it has traits of beauty and of grandeur, we are far from denying; and yet as a whole we hardly find it edifying; it has not lifted us, as all great music does, into that free ideal element of thought and feeling, where we seem to be at one with all and nearer to the universal heart. The rich, slumbrous, brooding and mysterious harmony of the opening is full of Oriental, even mythical suggestion. There is tender beauty in the melodic theme which is passed about from instrument to instrument, and is continually taken up again and cherished with new fondness (among others by the Corno Inglese, exquisitely played by Ribas). Then indeed comes a great crash, like the crack of doom, and the thread is lost; and the music wanders, too woe-begone and self-oblivious for music, whether there be a distraught maiden in the case or not; once, while the theme is vaguely recovering itself in the subdued wind instruments, the violins whimper and cry and shiver at an icy pitch upon the very verge of most intolerable discord. This may be graphic, but is it musical? The overture is worked up to an intense power and brilliancy of orchestration at the end, like the grand finales in theatrical spectacles, too bright to look upon. But has it kept the promise of that suggestive opening, and the lovely (although not original) melodic traits that follow? On the contrary, we feel throughout a lack of progress which is painful. A nightmare spell weighs heavily on each tremendous strain of the whole orchestra to get out what it has to say, but nothing comes. Again and again with loud solemnity of emphasis, with startling attitude and gesture, the orator begins his all-important statement, while you listen breathless; "but," "but," "BUT," he says:—but nothing comes. Turn now to two of the shortest Overtures, Beethoven's to Egmont and to Coriolanus, and think how much more is said in such short time, with moderate orchestration, than here is not said at far greater length, with all these extra means!

And yet the work, no doubt, was more than welcome to those persons who find the modern "effect" music appetizing to their musical palate. To most of us such seasoning is too high and makes us not sure if we have the taste of any real game at all. And to all musical persons it was interesting as being one of the better specimens of the new school,—such a work as can be introduced with safety now and then into a pure programme.

Delightful, after it, was the poetic, genial, and thoroughly musical Concerto by Mozart, so simple and unstrained in its happy inspirations, though comparatively "small," we must suppose, according to the measure of most piano-forte virtuosos and of the lovers of the modern orchestration. It was creditable to Miss MEHLIG as an artist, that she so readily consented to play one of Mozart's Concertos. This in D minor is commonly considered the best of them; and she was happy in her task, in both senses of the word happy. It was well nigh a perfect rendering, the orchestra coöperating well. The first movement, with its syncopated orchestral motive, and rich harmony, is full of beauty and of strength, of fine vitality, leaving a sense of abundant reserved power. The Romanza, beginning like the Trio in Don Juan somewhat, is in a very common, but delicious vein of Mozart; but the soft, luxurious melody springs up with startling vigor in the bold triplet passage in the minor near the end. The Finale is original and quaint and full of life. Miss Mehlig's rendering lacked nothing either of technique or expression. The Cadenzas which she introduced in the two quick movements are by Reinecke; we liked the second one the best, in which there is a momentary return of the Romanza theme.

The Overture to "Fidelio,"—the fourth to "Leonore"—completed the series, given in four successive concerts, of the introductions written by Beethoven for his one great drama. It is entirely different in themes and character from the others. In Nos. 2 and 3, you are in the midst of the excitement and the passion of the opera; the idea and plan of the second being more realized and wrought out in the third, which is the greatest of them all. The so called "No. 1" was really composed some two years later (1807), and while it has one or two of the same themes, and wholly the same tone of feeling, is more reflective and subdued,—more like a calm moonlight picture of the memory, musing over the scene of the tempest that has past. Those three are in the key of C. This fourth and last, in E, and written for a revival of "Fidelio" some nine or ten years later, borrows no themes from the opera itself, and is conceived more in the spirit of a regular theatrical Overture. It brings you right before the green curtain, full of expectation, more of joy and triumph than of tragedy. And in its brighter and more buoyant tone it lends itself more naturally as prelude to the light, half humorous music of the opening scene between the jailor's daughter and her lover. None the less it is a beautiful and brilliant work, thoroughly genial and worthy of Beethoven. The brooding and mysterious passage for which the bright, crisp opening chords arrest attention, gives just a passing, brief presentiment of all the prison glooms and shadows of the drama. We doubt if this Overture was ever so well played in Boston.—None of Miss MEHLIG's many fine achievements seems to us more perfect and more wonderful than her performance of the great Prelude and Fugue of Bach, as transferred from the Organ to the Piano-forte by Liszt. When she first played it here, a year ago, in that memorable chamber concert given to her by the Harvard Association, it won many persons to a delighted recognition, for the first time, of the beauty and expression of the Fugue. That she could be equally successful with it in the great Music Hall, holding an audience of near two thousand people in breathless attention to the end, was even more remarkable. In answer to a persistent recall, she played the brilliant, but now rather hacknied "Campanella" of Paganini à la Liszt. The recall was impropitious in view of the long Schubert Symphony that was to follow; the concert proved too long by just the length of that encore!

Why waste words in idle attempts to say more than has been said so many times about that glorious Symphony—that of the "heavenly length," the crowning work of Schubert? Played with care and with enthusiasm, it seemed more glorious than ever. So uplifting and sustaining to the very last chord, who would fail to hear it to the end, were it to take till midnight! All other cares seem idle and impatient when one is so engaged. There is extravagance for you! Schubert, in this concert, was made to follow Beethoven, for the same reason that Haydn and Mozart (in Symphony) had been placed before him. Schubert indeed is part and parcel of the Beethoven movement, so to speak. It is impossible not to feel that there is something kindred between these two great spirits. We trace it still as far as Schumann. We have not had the whole of Beethoven, until we have known him also in Schubert and Schumann, distinct as their three individualities may be.

In the sixth Concert (Jan. 26), following the historical sequence of great Symphonists, Mendelssohn will take turn, in his "Scotch" Symphony. The concert will open with Wagner's introduction (Vorspiel) to "Lohengrin." Then Mrs. BARRY will sing an aria from Bach's Passion Music; and Mr. PARKER will play, for the first time in Boston, the G-minor Concerto of Moscheles,—in honor of the venerated master and teacher who died during the past year. Part II. Symphony; Songs by Mrs. Barry: Overture to "Tell."

THEODORE THOMAS'S Series of "Seven Symphony and Popular Concerts" began in the Music Hall on Tuesday evening, with large, enthusiastic audience. With one exception, the plan embraces this time only parts of Symphonies, and the general complexion of the programmes is lighter and more miscellaneous than before. The one Symphony is the G-minor of Mozart for the sixth concert; but the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" of Schumann, in the fourth, may pass for a Symphony almost. The orchestra, of about fifty members, is unchanged and as admirable as ever, having been kept in daily, nightly practice since they last delighted us. In this sense, as a permanent, organic body, Thomas's is really the only Orchestra in America, and it is well that it should go about the country giving vivid, right ideas of what orchestral music and interpretation are.

The two programmes, thus far given, were of like pattern: first part classical, consisting of an Overture, a slow movement of a Symphony, a large piano piece with orchestra, and another Overture; second part popular, dance music, variations and light overtures.

On Tuesday evening the orchestra gave exquisitely pure and finished renderings of Cherubini's genial, Anacreontic Overture to "Anacreon;" of the heavenly Adagio of the Ninth Symphony (which, taken thus alone, without the other movements, and being of such sensitive, fine fibre, seemed to us to shiver in the cold at first until it gradually took possession of us), and of the ever fresh Overture to Oberon. Before this last, Miss MEHLIG gave an altogether admirable rendering of the Schubert Fantasia, op. 15, as arranged with orchestra by Liszt. But nothing was more perfect in its way than the Variations on the Austrian Hymn from Haydn's Quartet, played by all the strings. The rest of the second part consisted of Strauss Waltzes and Polkas; a wayward Polonaise in E, by Liszt, played by Miss Mehlig, with Schubert-Liszt Waltzes for encore, and the Overture to Masaniello.

On Wednesday afternoon, Mendelssohn's romantic sea-shore Overture, "Fingal's Cave" (Die Hebriden) led off. Then the mysterious Allegretto of the Seventh Symphony. Then Weber's brilliant Polonaise in E, with Liszt's instrumentation, played with enchanting grace and piquancy and brightness by the fair pianist. And then the singular Vorspiel to Lohengrin, which is a piece of far, wide musical perspective, distance and nearness being suggested by continuous high thin tones, white as it were and colorless, very gradually deepening and broadening into the fortissimo of the full orchestra with all its many-hued detail; and then it all recedes again and ends as it began. This is a foreshadowing overture. It hints in a single picture, highly poetic in conception and ingenious in execution, although strange enough as music, that which is the mainspring of action in the opera, the apparition of a something white on the horizon far away across the sea, which, coming nearer, proves to be the swan-drawn boat bearing the knight of the Holy Graal to the shore of Brabant, and his mysterious withdrawal in the same way when the evil powers defeat the blessing he has brought. In the second part Miss Mehlig played Schubert's Impromptu in A flat, and the "Soirées de Vienne" by Tausig. The orchestral pieces were Kreutzer's "Night in Granada" Overture; "Schlummerlied" by Bargel; Strauss's "Künstlerleben" Waltz and Polka Pizzicato, and a Turkish March by Mozart.—The third and fourth concerts come this afternoon and evening.

TESTIMONIAL TO MATTHIAS KELLER. The Gazette of last Sunday about expresses our impression:

The concert, last evening, in Music Hall, besides being a well-earned compliment to a popular author, had especial interest from its serving to introduce two debutantes, and two other musicians who had passed their novitiate, but were new to Boston. For each of the first pair—Miss Fanny Keller and Miss Augusta Endres—the same comment will suffice. Each is possessed of a naturally good voice, but each has yet much to learn of all the requirements of a vocalist before she can be fairly recognized as an available concert-singer. Miss Bensley and Mr. Castelli fulfilled all that had been promised. The lady's voice is clear, well-controlled, and of a capacity that reaches apparently higher than any that has yet been heard here; but, like all voices of the brilliant school, it has little or no sympathy. She sung Alary Polka and Robin Redbreast—both showy and meretricious. Mr. Castelli has hardly sufficient voice to fill the Music Hall, but he has what is nearly as valuable as strength—thorough cultivation and an almost faultless method. The other contributions—organ and piano solos, by Mr. Whiting and Mr. Daum, respectively, and choruses by the Orpheus Musical Society—were abundantly enjoyable. The programme contained several pieces written by the beneficiary.

NEXT—German Opera begins on Monday! And with about the finest fortnight's repertoire ever yet offered here: "Fidelio," "Tannhäuser," "Huguenots," "Don Juan," "Zauberflöte," "Freyshütz," Boieldieu's "White Lady," Halevy's "Jewess," "Martha," "Faust," Lortzing's "Csar and Zimmermann," and Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." The principal artists are partly well-known, partly new to us, but all of high repute.

Mr. E. J. LANG gives the first of his four Concerts at the Globe Theatre next Thursday afternoon, when, with the aid of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, he will present a Quintet by Mozart: Beethoven's Trio in C minor, (No. 8 of op. 1), for Piano, Violin and 'Cello; Chopin's Bohemian in B flat minor; and Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor.

More Beethoven Celebrations.

NEW YORK. The Tribune (not the Independent) should have been credited with the longer account in our last.

WHEELING, VA. A correspondent writes us: "Our little festival passed off with a degree of éclat that I hardly expected. This is an uncultivated Western town of about 20,000 inhabitants. To inflict upon such a town a classic programme was a bold venture; yet, from the fine manner in which all our music was rendered, the audience not only tolerated us, but went away delighted. We hope yet to make this a little oasis of musical taste amidst the great Sahara of 'Shoo fly' minstrelsy." The concert was given by four German singing societies, assisted by Vaas's Orchestra, Mr. Ebeling and others, under the general direction of Dr. H. J. Wiesel, and the somewhat mixed programme was as follows:

Overture "Post and Peasant".....	Suppe.
Orchestra, H. Vaas, Leader.
Chorus, "Home".....	Abt.
Liederkreis Society, H. Vaas, Leader.
Solo, "In Shades of Night".....	Luther.
Mr. P. Tremel.
Grand Trio, B flat, Op. 11.....	Beethoven.
Duett, "No end to sorrow," from Ruins of Athens. "
Mrs. C. P. Whitney and Mr. E. J. Whipple.
Chorus—The Origin of Love.....	Frel.
Chorus with Orchestral Accompaniment, "On open Sea."
Moshring.
Sung by all the Societies. The Orchestra under the direction of Prof. H. Vaas. Solo by C. Wilhelm.

Solo, Violin—Romance in D.....Beethoven.
Herman Kbeling.
Solo, Bass, "Gold, my Friend," from Fidelio. "

All the Societies.

WASHINGTON, D. C., DEC. 31, 1870.—Knowing that your interest in matters pertaining to the advancement of music extends even to our Southern City, I take the liberty of making a few notes for your valuable and ever welcome Journal.

We have here a great deal of musical talent which only needed to be united in different ways to result in mutual advantage to performers and auditors.

Prior to last season the only Societies here were: two German, the Saengerbund and the Arion Club; and one American, the Philharmonic Society. The latter is a mixed society, and will give the Oratorio of the "Creation," with the aid of Miss Kellogg, on the 28th of January. It numbers nearly two hundred voices and is doing well. Dr. J. P. Caulfield is the musical director.

A year ago last October an association named the Choral Society was organized from among the best American male singers of the District. They now number sixty active and one hundred and twenty inactive members. The latter are prominent officials and business men who are interested in the objects of the society. The "Chorals" have become very popular. They claim to be the first American male singing society in the country, and they are considering the question of joining the North American Saengerbund and contesting with the Germans for a prize at the Festival in New York next summer. Mr. Harry C. Sherman is the musical director.

This season a successful effort was made to organize an orchestra from among the amateurs and professionals who reside here. Mr. Geo. Felix Benkert, the musical director, is a musician, heart and soul, and to his abilities and untiring energy are due mainly the success of this enterprise.

They made their first appearance on Friday evening, the 23d inst., under the name of the Amateur Orchestral Union. The performance was commemorative of the centennial of the birth of Beethoven. A great deal of interest was manifested and a large and appreciative audience assembled to hear, for the first time in Washington, an orchestra of forty pieces competent to play a Beethoven Symphony. It was an entire success, and the Orchestral Union is a fixed fact. A copy of the programme is here appended:

*Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.
Prisoners' Chorus from "Fidelio"....."
Choral Society.
*Piano Concerto No. 5, in E flat....."

A Strange Eulogist.

MUSICAL CONDUCTORS.—AN ENGLISH REFORMER OF AMERICAN NOTIONS.—HANDEL REMODELLED AND BEETHOVEN DEPRECIATED.
To the Editor of the Sun [New York].

SIR:—I notice that the press has called attention to a gross liberty taken by Mr. James Pech in conducting Handel's "Messiah" at the Harmonic Society's concert on Monday evening. Contrary to the whole spirit of the piece, he seems to have twisted the oratorio about and altered the order of arrangement of the choruses to suit his own ideas of the way it should have been written, thereby making nonsense of what Handel and others have considered a somewhat serious and well-considered work. But the press have seemingly overlooked—perhaps purposely ignored—another even greater impertinence, to which, at the risk of giving Mr. Pech that prominence he seems so ardently to desire, I wish to call your attention.

The Philharmonic Society gave a concert on the recent occasion of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth, in honor of that event. A pamphlet was on that occasion thrust into the hands of most of the audience. It was written by this same Pech, and under cover of a thin eulogy, was in reality a tissue of disparagement and abuse of the illustrious composer, containing sneers at his incompetency, reprehension for his carelessness in writing, contempt of his vocal compositions, abuse of his methods, and comparisons of this master with other composers, always to the disadvantage of Beethoven. I confess that I was surprised that the Philharmonic Society should have allowed such a pamphlet to be circulated under their sanction on such an occasion, but I was more amazed at the boundless arrogance of this feeble writer, a musician of no standing whatever, no composer, not even a tolerable organist, yet raising his pen in confident and presumptuous criticism upon the man before whom he should have veiled his face and remained dumb. The worst of it is that what the man says is utterly untrue, and it will only earn him the contempt of every musician. Listen to some of the derogatory remarks: "It is to be regretted that his (Beethoven's) defects are so dazzling and sanctioned by such a name as to mislead many. He has not been such a benefactor to art as either Haydn or Mozart, because he has made no splendid inventions like the former, nor did he possess the fertility of the latter." Was ever a more ignorant sentence penned!

Again: "But if ever complaint he just or a warning voice he raised, it must surely be when a great but irregular artist appears with powers of mind to cast his own imperfections into the shade, and to seduce numbers to endeavor to imitate him." And Pech's is that warning voice! Let the world listen and reverse its judgments.

"Of Beethoven's mind," he says, "we may say that it was completely sui generis. How lamentable, then it is, that Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, highly cultivated as they are, should now be groping after the productions of such a mind."

"In some respects the effects which the writings of Beethoven have had upon art must, we fear, be considered injurious."

He pronounces Beethoven "deficient in grace and clearness," and "his harmony on many occasions affectedly harsh." He says, condescendingly, "these defects greater labor and study would have enabled him to correct." He accuses him of "extravagance that approaches to absurdity," and adds that "his works bear few such marks of studious labor as distinguished those of his predecessors."

He suggests that Beethoven was incapable of writing a "regularly conducted fugue," and dwells on this mere machinery of art as though it were the highest reach of musical composition. He is good enough to inform us that Beethoven entertained "false notions of his art," and that he "mistook noise for grandeur." The "Adelaide" he calls a "pleasing scena," and the "Ah perfido," which is perhaps the greatest dramatic song ever penned, he thinks, "with the other vocal writings of Beethoven, adds but little to his fame." He states that Beethoven "dosed his countrymen," and "thoroughly exhausted their patience" with the length of his symphonies.

And so on through page after page of disparagement and depreciation, mixed up with qualified and condescending patronage. No wonder that the pamphlet has excited the utmost indignation and disgust of musicians of every class, especially of those to whom it was addressed, the Directors of the Philharmonic Society, who seem now to painfully regret its appearance. Nothing would be easier than to show the shallowness of Mr. Pech's twaddle, and the falsity of his statements. Beethoven's four overtures to "Fidelio" show whether he was a lazy, slovenly, careless writer, or not. So does his published score to "Fidelio," containing his thousands of careful corrections. So does his "Sketch-Book," with phrases in some instances worked over twenty times to get them perfect. As to his not being able to write fugues, that is pure nonsense. If he did not write them, it was because he threw off their fetters, and wrote dramatic and not scholastic music. That he could write them when so disposed, his last quartet—which is a fugue thoroughly wrought out—is conclusive proof. That his vocal compositions did not add materially to his fame, Pech has himself shown to be an untrue statement in a long and eulogistic article on the mass in C, published in the programme of his Church Music Association Concert last year. But the foolish remarks refute themselves in the minds of all who know Beethoven's works, and it is useless to follow out their errors. When the Philharmonic next gives a festival in reverence of a composer, it is to be hoped they will choose for a pamphleteer some one who will not take advantage of the opportunity to traduce the memory and belittle the works of the man sought to be honored.

The 17th December, 1870.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

[We are indebted to the London Musical World for translating altogether the best and wisest (so far as we have seen) of the hundreds of appreciations of BEETHOVEN called forth by the hundredth anniversary of his birth.]

A time may, perhaps, come, when our almanacs, instead of containing an endless number of the names of saints—of whose life and doings even the firmest believer possesses but a slight knowledge—when, we say, our almanacs will record the days on which were born or on which died those men who have exercised a prominent influence on civilization, in the broadest acceptation of the word. When such is the case, we shall write, at least in Germany, under the date of the 17th December: Ludwig van Beethoven. On this day, a century ago, was our great tone-poet baptized; so much we know. It is considered probable that he was born the day before. When a nation does honor to the memory of a great man, it really honors only itself, for it shows that it knows how to recognize and appreciate a great mind sprung from itself. Ludwig van Beethoven was a genius such as but rarely appears in the art-history of any age or people. It has sometimes been asserted that, among the millions whom birth, education, and circumstances do not permit to participate in a highly intellectual life, thousands would become great men, were fate to favor them. We do not think so, but even were it the case, we should recognize, in this instance as well as in others, the wise economy of Nature. Men cannot master too much at one time, and a considerable period is always needed ere any important, and therefore great, man has worked out his due effect.

The material points in Beethoven's early pilgrimage are pretty generally known—some few, however, require further elucidation. On the whole, his career was simple and quiet. There were none of the wonderful successes which surrounded with brilliancy the youth of Mozart—or of the passionate and almost historical struggles such as Gluck and Handel underwent in Paris and in London. Nay, even a journey to England, like that which crowned the old age of Father Haydn, is wanting in the life of Beethoven. The life of Sebastian Bach alone offers still fewer points of contact with the wide, wide world! Even in his early youth, Beethoven's art became for him everything: a permanent source of employment; a delight; and a means of profit and of distinction. He was only twelve years old when he entered the musical establishment of the Elector Max Franz, filling in it the post of organist, pianist, and subsequently, even of tenorist. Thus, at his entry into life, he proved the support of his family, and felt, no doubt, a certain self-confidence from the consciousness that, though scarcely a youth, he was, in his artistic as well as his social character, satisfying requirements that we are justified in making only on mature manhood. The friendly reception with which he met in all circles at Bonn, especially at Mme. von Breuning's, enlarged the sphere of his accomplishments, and, when hardly more than a youth of five and twenty, he went, well prepared, to the Imperial capital in which his genius and his reputation were destined to burst forth into bloom.

Through the Elector (a son of the Empress Maria Theresa), and those about him, numerous and intimate relations existed between Bonn and Vienna; and, thanks to the intervention of his old patrons, Beethoven was admitted into the first families of the Austrian aristocracy. The dedication of his works would prove, even were we not aware of it from other sources, how deeply indebted the artist felt to those of high birth. It is solely to what they did that Vienna owes the fact of being able to call the great man more particularly her own. It is true that, during the long period of thirty-four years which he spent there, he never sought or found a sphere of personal influence—as a teacher, a conductor, or even as a virtuoso. He gave the Viennese public an opportunity of hearing his works before any one else heard them—an opportunity by which they did not always profit. The concerts at which he did so—and at some of which he appeared as a pianist—were, perhaps, the only occasions that brought him personally into contact with the Viennese public. He had something better to do than to conduct an orchestra or to assist young beginners with good advice—for he was one who directed music into new paths, and, by his works, exerted an elevating and guiding influence upon hundreds of thousands.

As far as a serious artistic life can be so, Beethoven's, taken all in all, may, perhaps, be termed particularly favored. He was able to live entirely for his work, and quickly met with the highest appreciation; while the miseries attending a somewhat badly-managed bachelor's establishment—miseries springing from his amiable weakness for brothers and nephews—must not, in conclusion, be estimated too highly. But there was a grey thread running through his life. When only in his eight-and-twentieth year, he felt a diminution in his power of hearing. For about twenty years the malady seems to have increased and sometimes to have diminished, until it terminated in total deafness. In addition to the pang of only half receiving the living impression of his productions, and of subsequently not receiving it at all—in addition to the rent in his intercourse with the world, which, from the very first possessed great attractions for him—he was most painfully worried, being a sensitive man, by all the experiments with which the disciples of Æsculapius assailed him, and ashamed, for a tolerably long time, to confess his malady, concealing it, and thereby, probably, rendering it worse. Attempts have been made to explain, by this want of the material sense of hearing, many compositions of the last period less practicable and less charming than the rest; but the man who, with his inward ear, could hear the Adagio of the Ninth Symphony and the "Benedictus" of the Missa Solennis, required no excitement of the senses. Whatever the amount of sorrow which the idea of the deaf composer may inspire, it is a great question whether his inability to hear did not contribute to make his nature more profound. A musician, as such, is, in general, indebted to his ear for more pain than pleasure—and how little of all we are obliged to hear is worth being heard, every one knows.

How, too, can we speak of solitude in the case of a man who, really and truly, was at home in a different world from that which surrounded him? Every one to whom has been granted, in any degree, the privilege of being artistically productive, can perhaps conceive, with blessed envy, what sort of an existence that of such a genius must be. If the slightest original notion exerts a vivifying influence, how shall we describe the ecstasy which must have been Beethoven's, when the first embryo-like notion of a new composition sprang up in his brain, assuming more and more distinctness of shape, and gradually filling his whole being, till all within him breathed, sang, sounded in melodies, of which he himself a short time before had no presentiment? And these tone-pictures filling the entire man did not vanish from him like light dreams—he knew how to grasp them with a hand possessing the strength of a giant; to hold them fast; to give them form and shape—to cast, as it were, even the most ethereal in bronze. Combined, too, with the marvellous charms this great man's fancy afforded him, was the ever-increasing and refreshing consciousness of his own intellectual power, the feeling of his mastery, the only true power and true freedom upon earth.

Especial interest is taken now-a-days in investigating most minutely all the details in the social position of great men. There is no objection to this, as long as we do not attempt to establish too close a connection between their works and their circumstances, for such an attempt leads to the most outrageous errors—or as long as we do not, with our enthusiasm reversed, endeavor to perceive the importance of their productions in the most trivial thing we learn concerning what they said and did. It is certain that excellent qualities of heart and disposition generally adorned Beethoven, and people readily forgave him his weaknesses. He met the poetry, the history, the great deeds of his time, with an active intelligence, nay, with passionate sympathy. But there were, and always are, thousands of men, his equals in elevation of character, in social virtue, and in noble conception of life, but not competent to produce anything that shall advance mankind. Beethoven, however, was able to express in wonderful works of art the lofty emotions and views that lived within him—and that is what makes him a great man.

Many, on the other hand, attempt to perceive the most essential greatness of such works in certain ideas, which, they assert, serve as a base, and which every one then endeavors to explain after his own fashion. But it is not that which a work of art conceals, it is that which it says, and the way in which it says it, that constitute its greatness. This greatness, moreover, is to be found in the conditions of that art of which we are treating. What elevates and inspires us, when we hear any of Beethoven's music, is the abundance, the originality, the boldness of imagination, the endless diversity of the melodies, and the charms they have for the senses, combined with their feeling, kindly power; their ingenious simplicity; their passionate energy; and their proud, high character—it is the way, so logical, and yet so free, in which they are carried out—it is the treatment, healthy, unaffected, and yet so original, of the harmony—the highly-colored, individual employment of the instruments of sound—in a word, the fulfilment of all the conditions which a musical composition demands, if it is to satisfy all that can be expected from it. What that means is known to the many who, gifted and talented as they are, have endeavored, and still endeavor, but in vain, to attain it.

Though Beethoven's name is full of import for the educated in all nations, and though his works have, since the beginning of the present century, continued to spread more and more in all countries, we Germans have a right to call him more especially ours. In political matters the bias of our nature toward the Ideal and the Spiritual may have been an obstacle in our way—but how much that is magnificent has it not produced! Such is the case with the love of instrumental music, that wondrous blossom of German genius, that most true poetry, without material subject, and without doubtful thoughts. Truly, it is a lofty people, from among which hundreds of thousands are continually assembling, in all directions, for the purpose of listening, with pious devotion, to the utterances which their harmony-inspired seers have delivered! In the very strictest, and, consequently most energetic signification of the words, the instrumental works of our great masters are tone-poems—and those of Ludwig van Beethoven are the most magnificent and the most sublime of any. How deeply what we owe him is felt on all sides, is shown by the festivals, now being consecrated to his memory. Neither the thought of all the great things that have been done and achieved upon the blood-drenched fields of battle, nor anxiety for what still remains to be achieved, has scared our minds into forgetting to consecrate the day which, a century ago, gave us the musician Beethoven. Let us hope that, in the fullness of the power it has victoriously attained, our nation will preserve its noble sense for the Beautiful, and its proud delight in all the magnificent things which its poets, in words, and in tone, have presented to it. And so, on Beethoven's Day, we exclaim to it, in the words of Schiller—

"Freue Dich, dass die Gabe des Liedes vom Himmel herab-kommt, Dass der Sanger dir singt, was ihn die Muse gelehrt!

Weil der Gott ihn besetzt, so wird er dem Hörer zum Gotte, Weil er der Glückliche ist, kannst Du der Selige sein."

Marx's Characterisation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

BY A. E. KROEGER.

About the year 1822 Fred. Rochlitz communicated to Beethoven a proposition from Härtel of Leipzig (the firm is now Breitkopf and Härtel) to write a musical accompaniment to Goethe's "Faust," somewhat in the nature of Beethoven's famous music to Goethe's "Egmont." Beethoven jerked up his head, threw up his hands: "That would be something, indeed! The trouble is, I have for some time been engaged on three other great works. Much has already been elaborated;—that is, in my head. I must first get rid of these; two great symphonies, each different from my other ones, and an oratorio." The oratorio was not even begun; of the one symphony Beethoven left only a few sketches; the other symphony is the world-renowned Ninth.

At the close of the year 1823 Beethoven returned to Vienna. The first part of the great symphony was finished "in his head;" so was also the leading idea of the second part, namely, that—against all rules of symphonical construction—this one should consist of one instrumental part and one vocal part, and that this second unheard of vocal part should have for its theme Schiller's wonderful "Hymn to Joy." The first (instrumental) part had even been sketched in its principal movements on paper. The problem was, how to effect a transition from the instrumental to the vocal part. One day, returning home from a walk, Beethoven cried, triumphantly: "I have it; I have it now!" and he showed his friend Schindler his sketch-book, wherein, under the notes of a recitative there stood these words: "Let us sing the song of the immortal Schiller!" But afterwards he changed these words and substituted the—as we shall see—much more proper recitative: "Ah friends, not these tones; but let us start tones pleasanter and fuller of joy." About February, 1824, the colossal work was finished. In May it was to be performed at a grand concert for Beethoven's benefit,—a concert that was to be a sort of solemn protest against the lighter music of Rossini, then all in vogue, and which attained increased significance by the publication of a highly appreciative letter to Beethoven, signed by the highest noblemen and musical artists in Vienna. Of musical, financial, and other difficulties, there arose, of course, an infinite number, as usual. There was a difficulty about the basso for the recitative. There was a difficulty about the word "Missa" in the programme, which the Imperial censor construed to be a profanation of divine things. Finally came the female soloists: Henrietta Sontag, soprano, and Caroline Unger, alto, and made their difficulties, saying to Beethoven:

"You are simply a tyrant of vocal organs."

To which he replied, smilingly: "You both have simply been spoiled by Italian moles of singing and music."

"But," said Henrietta Sontag, "this part, 'Joy gave mankind grapes and kisses!' can't you change it? It is altogether too high!"

"And," said Caroline Unger, "this part here is altogether too high for an alto voice; can't you change it?"

To all which objections Beethoven replied, "I tell you again and again, No!"

"Well, in God's name, let us go on and finish this torture," quoth Henrietta Sontag.

On the 7th of May, 1824, the grand concert took place. The programme was:

1. Great Overture by Beethoven.
2. The Kyrie, Credo, Agnus Dei and Dona from the Missa Solemnis by Beethoven.
3. Great Symphony with Solo and Chorus in the Finale on Schiller's Hymn to Joy, by Beethoven.

The house was crowded; the triumph complete. A critic wrote:

"But where shall I find words to characterize these gigantic works, particularly after having heard them only once, and—so far as the singing was concerned—by no means sufficiently well done. . . Yet the impression was indescribably grand and magnificent, and the applause enthusiastic, that rose from overflowing hearts up to the great master, whose inexhaustible genius had unlocked a new world, and unveiled never before heard or dreamed of marvels of his sacred art." And of the Ninth Symphony he wrote: "Like a clap of thunder the finale, in D minor, announced itself in the shrill, piercing small ninth over the chord of the dominant; in the manner of a pot-pourri we then had all the previous chief themes reflected as from a mirror in short periods, and once more presented to us in a mixed sequence; then suddenly the bass-viol's growled out a recitative, which seemed to ask: 'What in the world is going to be done now?'—a question they answered with a soft running theme in D major, which developed itself through the gradual joining of all the other instruments by wonderfully glorious connections and measured gradations into a most powerful crescendo. But when now, upon the behest of the solo bass-voice, the full chorus of human voices with majestic glory began the great Hymn in praise of Joy, the gladdened heart opened itself in blessed enjoyment to the rapture of the music and the song, and a thousand throats cried: 'Hail, hail, hail! to the divine art of tones! Praise, thanks and glory to its worthiest high priest!' Cooled off, as the writer of this sits now at his desk, he must declare that that moment will never be forgotten by him. Art and truth celebrated here their most brilliant triumph; and it might very properly be said: 'non plus ultra.' Who could succeed in surpassing this wonderful passage? Hence it is also an impossibility, that the other strophes of the poem—arranged partly for solo voices and partly for chorus, and in various tempos, times and keys—should produce a similar effect, however excellently the separate parts have been treated; nay, the most enthusiastic admirers of the composer are firmly convinced, that the truly unparalleled finale would make a still greater impression in a more concentrated form, and that the composer himself would share the view, had not cruel fate deprived him of the power of hearing his own creations."

Such was the impression produced at its first production by the Ninth Symphony and the novel form Beethoven had given to it. For the ordinary form of a Symphony is the rendering and developing of three or four musical movements by an orchestra, as a Sonata is the rendering of three or four musical themes on the piano; the first movement being generally an Allegro, the second an Andante, and the third again an Allegro. If there are four movements, the fourth movement is usually a Scherzo or Minuetto, and leads over from the Andante to the last Allegro. The character of these movements can of course be changed ad libitum; in Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, for instance, there is no Andante nor even the shadow of a melancholy feeling. But in the Ninth Symphony Beethoven gave an utterly new form to the symphony by introducing the human voice at the close, thereby, as it were, suggesting the insufficiency of mere instrumental music to express what he wished to express. And Beethoven had been chiefly a composer of instrumental works. The Ninth Symphony separates, therefore into two chief parts: the first instrumental, the second in the nature of a cantata. The first part has three movements, 1, Allegro; 2, Molto Vivace (being a Scherzo with Trio); 3, Adagio with variations. With the Adagio the first part closes, and in place of the expected fourth movement, Finale, we have a complete Second Part. This second part opens with a sketch by the instruments of all the musical themes of the first part, and of the coming second part; all of these sketches of themes mixed up in a strange way, and dropped almost as soon as taken up, as if Beethoven had been looking for some theme that would not elaborate itself, and had after a short trial found them all insufficient. Finally the bass instruments find the right melody—the one which the voices take up afterwards—and the other instruments striking in, the grand melody of the Hymn to Joy sweeps into full majesty. But at this very point Beethoven once more seems to get dissatisfied, the melody stops, the harsh D minor theme of the first part is heard once more, stops, and, lo and behold, the problem is solved: the human voice enters and stops the instruments: "O friends not these tones! but let us start tones pleasanter and fuller of joy." Then sweeps in the grand chorus.

"Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness,
Daughter from Elysium."

Such is the Second Part.

Much has been written about this Ninth Symphony. It is certainly one of the most admirably elaborated and melodious symphonies of Beethoven, and wonderful in its unity. The grand Hymn to Joy of the Second Part is in almost all its melody musically suggested in the three movements of the first part, particularly in the Trio of the second movement, the Molto Vivace. And yet no other work of music has produced so many disputes among musical and non-musical people. Mendelssohn does not like it. Spohr says: "The three movements of the first part appear to me, in spite of some strokes of genius, worse than any of the previous eight symphonies; and as for the second part, it appears to me so monotonous and tasteless, and in its arrangement of Schiller's Hymn so trivial, that I cannot understand how a genius like Beethoven could have written it." Wagner, on the other hand, is an enthusiast in its favor, and so is Liszt. A scholarly as well as interesting characterization of the work has been written by A. B. Marx in his Life of Beethoven. This we propose now to translate; and these remarks are merely introductory to the translation.

The History of Music.

THIRD LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

[Reported for the Boston Journal.]

The third of the series of eighteen lectures on the History of Music, by Mr. John K. Paine, was delivered at Wesleyan Association Hall on Saturday. The particular division of the subject treated upon was "The Flemish Composers of the 15th and 16th Centuries; Music in England, France and Germany."

Until the year 1400, said the lecturer, the progress in music was very slow and slight compared with what followed after that date. The new age witnessed the revival of letters, the invention of printing, and the enlightenment of European society. The Netherlands at this period were in many respects in advance of the rest of Europe. For nearly two centuries Flemish composers held undisputed sway, and their name and fame spread over the civilized world. Through them chiefly polyphonic music, which hitherto had given but vague hints of its possible future, became so florid that it was aptly called the age of elaborate counterpoint. Unison singing was wholly neglected for over two centuries. The lecturer referred to an important discovery made in the present century, of an ancient book of songs, called the Lochheimer Liederbuch, together with a work on organ playing by Conrad Paumann, the famous blind musician of Nuremberg. This book contains forty-five songs and other vocal pieces, thirty-six of which must have been composed before the middle of the fifteenth century. This work goes to prove that correct and good counterpoint flourished first in Germany, though it was yet to undergo a more fruitful development in another country.

[One of the songs of the above selection, a fine specimen of three-part harmony, was sung by Mr. Rudolphsen, Dr. Langmaid and Mrs. Henry.]

It is customary to divide the history of the Flemish school into four epochs, as represented by its composers of most distinctive merit, Dufay, Ockenheim, Josquin, Gombert, Willaert and Orlando Lasso. The first epoch of Dufay and Ockenheim marked the regular development of counterpoint. In the second epoch, artistic skill and finesse, involved contrapuntal progressions, reached an extraordinary height, while the fame of the Flemish composers became universal, and their influence was undiminished until the sixteenth century. The third epoch marks the return from extravagances in technical skill, in abstruse experiments, to more reasonable boundaries of art. The fourth epoch closes with its great master, Orlando Lasso, but who is only nominally to be classed with this school. Since his time Flanders has never regained her ascendancy in music.

Mr. Paine gave interesting sketches of William Dufay, the so called founder of the Flemish school, whose reputation as a composer began about 1436, and who died in 1474; John Ockenheim, or Ockenheim, who was the real founder and head of the Flemish school, and who lived to the great age of one hundred years, having been born early in the fifteenth century; Josquin de Pres, who was born about 1445, and who may be considered the musical genius of his age, and the greatest master before Orlando Lasso; Nicholas Gombert, of Brugges, who was director of church music for Charles V., and of several others of the early composers. Josquin was led to perform feats of virtuosity in composition, and in his time the words, even of pieces to be sung in the church, became a matter of secondary importance. Vulgar and offensive words were sung in church, and, on the other hand, church music was made to accompany dancing and other festivities. The composers of church music in that day thought they had accomplished something meritorious if they had succeeded in awakening a desire to dance among the congregation. Erasmus says that people ran to church as to the theatre, to have their ears tickled. The lecturer feared this criticism might be applied with some pertinence to people of our own day. Some of Josquin's music, however, was of a very fine character, and Ambros speaks of the Netherland master, in comparison with Palestrina, by saying: "Josquin's compositions possess something that profoundly touches our hearts, while those of Palestrina soothe our spirits with their heavenly strains."

[Two fine examples of Josquin's music, one a specimen of simple counterpoint—note against note—and the other a selection from a motette treated more elaborately, were sung with excellent effect by a chorus of some twenty voices, made up from among our best singers.]

Reference was made to the invention of printing music with movable metal types (made by Ottaviano del Petrucci of Fossombrone, in 1502), a discovery which proved of untold value, and the concluding portion of the lecture was devoted to an entertaining account of the early condition of music in France, England and Germany.

FOURTH LECTURE (Dec. 31.)

Subject: "The Italian Composers of the 16th Century."

The lecturer remarked that while the world had ever regarded Italy with admiration and love, as the birth-place of modern literature and art, it seemed remarkable that a less renowned country should claim our homage for the dawn of a new era in music—for working out the problem of harmony, which was no revival, but in reality a new creation in art. It was in Flanders that the principles of harmony were first mastered, and the age of elaborate counterpoint fully established, yet Italy was not without good musicians, who in their comparatively inferior positions, were the means of accomplishing good results.

The forms of secular music most common in Italy in the 14th and 15th centuries were the Frottole, the Villote or Villanelli, and the Madriale or Madrigal. The Frottole were four-part songs of rather a gay and trivial description—often popular street songs. The Villote or Villanelli were peasant's songs originally, as the name signifies. The Madriale or Madrigal was known as early as the 13th century, but was not fully developed until Willaert and other masters gave it a permanent form and place in music. The word madrigal is derived from mandra a flock, and was formerly applied to simple shepherd's song. There were other favorite vocal pieces of a more general character, which were composed in accordance with a chosen metre, to which the poem was afterwards set. The name given to this style of composition was modus, or air, and from this source is derived the modern name air, or aria, which signifies the manner of singing and not the medium of song, as many suppose; that is the sound of vibrating air. These forms of secular song were inspired undoubtedly by the beautiful poetry which enriched Italian life at that period—the age of Dante, Petrarch and Boccaccio.

As Rome was the centre of civilization in the middle ages, so it was also the central point of the musical world before Italy gained ascendancy through the genius of her native composers. The Papal Choir was for a long time supplied with singers and composers from all parts of Europe, but principally from the Netherlands. Under the brilliant reigns of Pope Julius II. and successor, Leo X.—the patrons of Raphael and Michael Angelo—many Flemish masters were called to Italy. The only Italian master at that time worthy of special mention was Costanza Festa, who was Papal singer in 1517, and died in 1545, and who was the most eminent Italian composer before Palestrina. One of the first masters of that day was the Spanish composer, Christofino Morales of Seville, who entered the Papal Choir about 1540. Among the most prominent among the many Franco-Flemish masters at Rome were Jacob Arcadelt and Claude Goudimel. The latter, who was born early in the 16th century and who was in Rome before 1540, was the teacher of Palestrina. The melody of "Old Hundred" has been attributed to Goudimel. Giovanni Pierluigi, called Palestrina after his birth-place, a small ancient town in the vicinity of Rome, was born in 1514.

The lecturer gave an elaborate and exceedingly interesting sketch of Palestrina and his important services to musical art. When an effort was made to abolish figural or contrapuntal music from the Roman Church and to restore the simple unison Gregorian song, Palestrina succeeded by the exercise of his talent as a composer to defeat it. He was called the Savior of Music. He adopted a style which was destined to be the model for ages, and the stila Palestrina became the representative form of alla capella music. Palestrina died in 1594 and was buried with high honors at St. Peter's. The list of his works, given by Baini, comprises twelve books of Masses in four to six voice parts, seven books of Motets in four to eight voice parts, and books of Lamentations, Litanies, Hymns, Magnificents and Sacred and Secular Madrigals.

Mr. Paine next gave the sketch of the life and labors of Orlando Lasso, the greatest master of the Flemish school, who was born in 1520, and passed his life for the most part in Italy and Bavaria. His original name was Roland de Lattre, but he changed it because his father had been sentenced for counterfeiting money. Lasso was called "the musical Phoenix of his age," "the prince of musicians," and all the other musicians of the 16th century, except Palestrina, were obscured by his fame. He was a wonderfully prolific composer, and according to Delmotte, his works number some 2337 compositions, which have been collected and preserved at Munich.

In passing to a consideration of the Venetian masters of the 16th century, and their music, the lecturer gave an interesting account of some of the early organ players in the famed Church of St. Marks, which was built early in the 9th century. He then gave some entertaining facts relating to Adrien Willaert, who was born in 1490, and died in 1563, and who was not only the founder or real promoter of the Madrigal, but also of great service in advancing musical art in general; Cyprian de Rore, a Flemish composer, who succeeded Willaert at St. Marks; Andreas Gabrielli, who was born at Venice in 1510 and died in 1586; and the eminent nephew of the last named, Giovanni Gabrieli, who was born about the middle of the 16th century, and composed some very beautiful church music.

In the course of the lecture a chorus of a dozen or more voices gave several interesting illustrations of early Italian music, the pieces sung comprising a specimen of Palestrina's early music, a Gloria Patri, written for two choirs, a selection from a motet by Orlando Lasso, and a specimen of the music of Giovanni Gabrieli, which seemed decidedly modern in style.

FIFTH LECTURE. (JAN. 7.)

Subject: "The Reformation and its influence on musical art, with brief sketches of the leading composers of that period in Germany and England."

The Reformation marked a new phase in the development of music. It accomplished this directly by means of the Protestant Church, and through the reaction which it caused within the Roman Catholic Church. During the early stages of the Reformation great violence and harm was done to the fine arts; this spirit, however, did not extend in the same degree to music, and although the Presbyterians and Puritans banished trained choirs and musical instruments from their places of worship, the great body of the Protestant world made music the handmaid of religion. As Germany was the central point of the Reformation, so it was in an equal degree the starting point of this new and peculiar phase of musical progress. Although there had been able masters in Germany at an earlier period, contemporaneously with the Flemish school, like Isaac and Finck, still, the true national characteristics of German music were born of the new spirit which animated the people of that time. Martin Luther, the head and front of the Reformation, took the liveliest interest in music, which he exemplified in his grand "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," and other famous melodies and hymns. Some of the noblest words in praise of music are his. There is one great difference between the early Protestant church music of Germany and that of the Roman and Venetian schools of the sixteenth century. The German church music was of a popular character, and sprang directly from the people. It was more simple, lyrical and expressive, but less artistic and elaborate than Italian music, which was the result of individual skill and genius more than of an universal, popular spirit, notwithstanding it was founded on the ancient Gregorian song, and had received considerable impulse from the secular music in Italy during the century and a half previous to Palestrina. There were three sources from whence the Lutheran church derived its music; 1st, from the early Latin hymns and melodies of the Roman church; 2nd, from mediæval popular sacred music in Germany prior to the Reformation; 3rd, from the secular music of the middle ages. In regard to German mediæval sacred songs prior to the Reformation, it is a well authenticated fact that long before that age it was the custom to sing a part of the religious service in German instead of Latin. On the other hand Latin words were not wholly dispensed with in the Lutheran church before the 17th century.

The lecturer mentioned several well-known German hymns which were derived from secular melodies. Many of the melodies have undergone changes since they were written, in order that they might be the more easily sung in unison by a large congregation. At the present day the notes are nearly of equal length. It is a singular fact, remarked Mr. Paine, that neither in England nor America has congregational singing, as practiced, proved fully worthy of its high object, for the reason that the music which is sung is not often solemn nor elevating.

It is too florid and insipid. The rhythm is not sufficiently simple to enable a large body of worshippers to sing the notes properly and effectively, as would be the case were chorals used. Why English speaking people have not appropriated for this purpose the noble melodies sung in Lutheran churches, is hard to understand. No better work could be accomplished for Christian public worship in this country than to introduce everywhere the right kind of congregational singing, which ought to be considered just as essential to genuine religious service as the sermon.

Contemporaneously with the simple style of congregational singing, the church service was enriched with artistic choir music; and the contrapuntal treatment of choral melodies in many voice parts was very common in the 16th and 17th centuries. The usual form of such compositions was brief and closely wrought. The melody was frequently placed in the tenor as cantus firmus, and the other voices were set to it in free imitative counterpoint. The two-fold character of Lutheran church music was shown in the choral books of the 16th century. The style of music which the Reformation inaugurated, which was a combination of the popular element with the development of more artistic forms of expression, reached its culmination in the 18th century, in the Cantatas and Passion music of Sebastian Bach, the highest form of Protestant religious music, if not of all religious musical art.

Brief accounts were given of John Walther, Louis Senfl, Hans Leo Hasler, John Eccard and Michael Praetorius, who, with Luther, were the musicians most prominently connected with German music in the 16th century; and a religious song in five-part harmony, by Eccard, was sung with fine effect by a choir of fifteen or twenty voices, under Mr. Paine's direction.

The latter part of the lecture was devoted to an interesting account of the music of England in the 16th century, and in this connection accounts were given of Dr. Christopher Tye, Robert White, Thomas Tallis, William Bird, John Dowland, Dr. John Bull, Thomas Morley, and others who were identified with the musical progress of that age. The choir also gave interesting illustrations of the music of the time, the first a madrigal by Dowland, and the other a ballad in five-part harmony by Morley.

Jullien.

A RECORD OF A REMARKABLE MAN.

Most musical amateurs have to this day kindly recollections of Jullien, the superb maestro who years ago gave "monster concerts." His career is thus told in the last number of the London Choir:

"This celebrated composer of dance music was the son of Antonio Jullien, band-master of the Cent-Suisses in the revolution of 1789. Upon the massacre of his regiment at the Louvre, he emigrated to Rome, where, attaching himself to the body-guard of the Pope, he formed an alliance with an Italian lady of some distinction. Some time after the union M. Jullien determined on revisiting France, and while on the journey, in the French Alps, in 1812, at a chalet near Sisteron, young Jullien was born. The intervention of circumstances altered the original intention of proceeding to France, and the family remained at Sisteron amid the wild solitudes of the Alps. Here Antonio taught singing, and his little son, with an intuitive genius for music, it is said, learned the solfeggios from casually hearing them several times, so as to be able to repeat them with astonishing precision and fluency.

"His father, surprised and delighted at this wonderful power of acquirement, cultivated his infant voice, taught him a number of pleasing French and Italian songs, and gave concerts in the most important towns in the south of France, where the child was regarded, in all the fondness of public enthusiasm, as le petit phénomène. At the age of five, doubtless from the too premature exercise of a delicate organ, he lost his voice, and returning to his mountain home, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of the violin, on which instrument he displayed so much skill as to induce his father to project a series of concerts in the principal Italian cities, where he met with universal favor. On one occasion, after performing the difficult variations of Rode at the Teatro Reale at Turin, he was lifted from the stage into the Queen's box to receive the regal marks of delight. This incident brought him into great favor with the court, and for a whole season he was the caressed of the Sardinian noblesse. While sojourning for professional purposes at Marseilles, his father met the Admiral de Rigny, then commander of the squadron of the Levant, who induced him to abandon his musical pursuits and enter his service. This strange mutation in their affairs of life led to father and son remaining in the French navy for three years, both being present at the battle of Navarino in 1827. Returning to France at the end of this time, young Jullien, inspired with a feeling of heroism, enlisted as a soldier, and for six months bore the drudgery of a musket in the Fifty-fourth regiment of infantry. But this dull routine of stringent discipline was ill-adapted to the temper and restless genius of our hero. His regiment being ordered to Briançon on the Piedmontese frontier, he deserted for the purpose of visiting his mother, then living at Turin, whom he had not seen for several years. Returning to the quarters at night in a deep snow, he scaled the walls of the ramparts, and seeking the colonel in command, sued for clemency at his hands. The officer who, it seems, was a benevolent man, heard his story, and touched by the filial love of the young soldier, interceded, and thus saved him from the fate of ignominy and death.

"His father, shortly after the occurrence, purchased his discharge, and with the secret love of the musical art burning in his soul, young Jullien set out on foot, and walked to Paris, determined, if possible, to enter the Conservatoire. A firm will and indomitable energy overcame every obstacle, and in less than six months after his arrival he was entered as élève in that institution. On retiring from this establishment, Jullien received the appointment of director of the concerts at the Champs Elysées, and the balls of the Académie Royale. In this position he was brought prominently before the public of the French capital, and a well-earned popularity induced him to leave the hotel of the Duke of Padua, which he converted into a grand salle for balls and concerts that was long the rage of Paris. So successful was his initial introduction of the Italian casino into France that several managers of the leading theatres formed a clique to subvert the efforts of the devoted entrepreneur, the end of which was that the year 1839 drove him to England. He commenced his excellent promenade concerts at Drury Lane theatre, at the same period, and from that time until 1859 his brilliant festivals created, not only in London, but throughout the United Kingdom, the most enthusiastic feelings of interest among all classes.

"Amid the vivacity of his ad captandum levities, Jullien never lost sight of the sterling and beautiful compositions of the great masters. In this respect he may be said to have educated the public at large, familiarizing by degrees the general ear with a class of music that formerly was confined to the sympathies and appreciation of the select few. This popularization of the works of such authors as Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn is an achievement in itself worthy of conferring honor on Jullien, who undeniably had the public taste to a considerable extent under his direction. With a laudable desire to establish in London an English opera, he organized in 1847 a troupe of artists of celebrity, and produced a series of works in a style of splendor unprecedented in the annals of the English lyric stage. But this effort, like many others of a similar nature, was ill-requited; and at the end of the season the manager found himself loser of an enormous sum, the results of at least ten years of active professional labor. It was during this time that he introduced to the English public in opera Mr. Sims Reeves, whose fine voice had attracted his attention in Italy.

"M. Jullien's most ambitious work was the opera of 'Pietro il Grande,' produced in 1853, at the Opera House, Covent Garden. Its production was characterized by a magnificence and splendor of ensemble, rarely witnessed even at the first opera house of the metropolis; but in spite of the show it did not succeed. M. Jullien was not quite up to the mark in writing a grand opera. To enumerate his smaller works—his 'waifs and strays' of music—would be like naming the leaves of the forest. They have been taken into custody by the world, and many have become 'household sounds.' If Jullien passed the greater part of his life in gilded saloons, surrounded by dance and revelry, his end showed a fearful reverse. Confined for debt in a French prison, he breathed his last amidst poverty and wretchedness, at the beginning of the year 1860. Poor Jullien deserved a better fate! He was a simple, kind-hearted, honorable man, wishing well to everybody. Had he put less trust in his fellow men, he might have prospered in this world's affairs and still have been among us."

Liszt's Description of Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

"Tannhäuser" has at length been heard in Boston, calling forth, of course, a variety of opinions and a great deal of discussion. It is seventeen years since we translated in this Journal the glowing analysis of Wagner's opera by his great admirer, Liszt, with such hasty rendering as we could make of extracts from the libretto—Wagner's own production—which has indeed no little power and beauty as a poem. To our younger readers it should be as good as new to-day, and for their sake we reproduce some portions of it.

The plot of "Tannhäuser" refers to the Wartburg at Eisenach, belonging to the domain of the Grand Duke and recently restored, in the most perfect taste, by his hereditary successor. Famous was this castle in the middle ages. Here the landgraves of Thuringia extended a brilliant protection to the minstrels of their time, and the miraculous virtues of Saint Elizabeth, who reigned here, have been recently refreshed in the memory of the faithful by the poetico-religious learning of Count Montalembert. * * *

The story of the opera is borrowed from one of the old traditions of the region. Collating and combining single facts from various chronicles, the composer has shaped out of them an episode, full of poetic, fantastic and dramatic elements. In the thirteenth century, while traces of not wholly vanished heathenism still shone through the superstition, that attached partly to the Christian cultus, and partly to the names of the Greek mythology, (confused ideas of which spread from the learned down among the people,) it happened, that a goddess Holda, who once had been the type of beauty and presided over Spring and flowers and the delights of nature, had gradually in the popular imagination become blended with the Grecian Venus, and at last represented the allurements of appetite and the charms of sensual gratification. This mythical person, whom they called "Dame Venns," had her dwelling in the inside of the mountain. One of her principal abodes was in the Hölrselberg, a mountain near the Wartburg. There in a fairy palace she held open court, surrounded by her naiads, nymphs and ayrens, whose song was heard in the distance by those unhappy victims of impure desires, who, misled by these fateful voices, wandered by unknown ways into this grotto, under whose inveigling charms Hell lurked, enticing to eternal ruin those who yielded to its damnable temptations.

Tannhäuser, a knight and minstrel, had borne off a splendid victory in one of those contests for the palm of minstrelsy, and had won the secret love of the princess Elizabeth of Thuringia, although to him her admiration seemed but cold and condescending patronage. A short time after he had mysteriously disappeared, no one knew why or whither. When the landgrave was returning one day from the chase, surrounded by the singers who had been Tannhäuser's rivals, and who formed the clear shining Pleiades of that epoch, they found him, not far from the castle, kneeling in the highway, and uniting his fervent prayer with the chant of pilgrims in procession through the valley toward Rome. Speedily recognized and questioned, he answers always shyly and mysteriously: "I come from afar," he says, "where I found neither peace nor rest." Sorrowful and downcast, he is about to continue his lonely way and will not follow his friends. Wolfram von Eichenbarch, one of the most famous minstrels of that time, seeks eagerly to detain him and sings to him of Elizabeth:

Alas! when thou so proudly left us,
Her heart was closed to all our strains;
O turn thee back, thou valiant singer,
Keep not thy song from ours afar,—
Back to our tuneful banquet bring her,
Still o'er us shine her virgin star!

Tannhäuser repeats that name with the accent of unexpected joy, and finally, overcome in his strange resistance, he exclaims: "To her! to her! O lead me back to her!"

At Tannhäuser's unlooked for return the princess revives. In his tender love for his daughter, the landgrave conceives the idea of a new minstrel's contest, of which he proclaims her queen. Persuaded that Tannhäuser will again bear off the victory, he promises to refuse no prize to the victor of that day, and he chooses Love as the theme of their songs. Wolfram begins, himself an enthusiast for Elizabeth, but with that spiritual love that rejoices in self-sacrifice, and seeks only the happiness of the beloved object, even at the expense of its own:—Wolfram, who leads the easily forgetting loved one back to her, from whom he can himself expect no other confession than the verse in Schiller's ballad:

Ritter, treue Schwesterliebe
Widmet euch dies Herz,
Fordert keine andre Liebe, &c.

But like the Ritter Toggenburg, while he knows himself not loved, he still loves on; and this self-renunciation, which bows the soul down in its excess of hidden energy, betrays itself in his song, full of mute adoration for the feeling, which finds its only satisfaction in its own self-mortifying persistency.

Tannhäuser rises and sings how he too, better than any one, knows that fountain of bliss and inspiration, of which Wolfram sang :

O, evermore with fervid yearning
The sparkling spring I see, and fain
Must cool this thirst within me burning,
Nor will the eager lips refrain.

Walther von der Vogelweide sings :

I tell thee this, O Henry, hear it :
The fountain, it is Virtue, sure,
And thou must fervently revere it,
And bow thee at a shrine so pure.
But if thy lips thereto thou touchest,
Thy wanton passion heat to quell,
Or but too near the brink approachest,
Thou dost dissolve the wondrous spell.

Tannhäuser resumes the strain more vehemently, of which the burthen is : All creatures are created for enjoyment, and only in enjoyment can true love be known. The unworthy strain excites the virtuous ire of Biterolf, who with a warlike impetuosity and in a contemptuous, perhaps jealous tone, challenges him to another contest :

For woman's honor, stainless treasure,
As knight I ever wield a sword,
But naught see I in aimless pleasure,
That's worth a blow, or worth a word.

A storm of applause interrupts Biterolf, as well as all the adversaries of Tannhäuser, who replies with bitterness :

Ha! foolish prattler, Biterolf!
Sing'st thou of love, thou angry wolf?
What joys well worth enjoy'ing seem
To me, thou truly dost not dream.
What bliss hath wretch like thee e'er tasted?
Thy life is poor in love, I trow.
What golden joys on thee are wasted,
In sooth were hardly worth a blow!

Tumult ensues ; the rattling of swords follows the the accord of harps. Wolfram tries to restore the peace, to banish all disturbance from the hall, and from that hallowed presence ; he apostrophizes Love in a strain of the highest inspiration, striving to sing its praises worthily and purely ; he prays that his song may win the prize of heavenly sanctification, and that all sin may be banished out of that pure and noble circle. Tannhäuser, beside himself through the taunts and rage and malice of which he is the mark, scarcely hears him and attunes a song to the praises of the heathen goddess :

To thee, Love's Queen, be all my songs resounding !
Now shall thy praise be sung aloud by me !
Thy charm's the spring of beauty all abounding,
And all sweet miracles do spring from thee.
In eager arms whose'er hath clasped thee glowing,
What Love is, he, he only may recount :—
Tame, shivering souls, such ecstasy ne'er knowing,
Away ! and seek the mystic Venus mount !

A cry of horror escapes every breast. The noble ladies fly, affrighted by the name that so offends their chastity. The men all draw their swords at once and rush upon the desperate sinner, whose long absence is now at last explained. But Elizabeth, who at first had felt crushed down by this fearful revelation, throws herself instantly between their swords, and covers him with her virgin body, as with a shining shield :

Back ! I care not for death !
What is the wound your swords can make, compared With the death-thrust I have received from him ?

While all are astonished that she has the courage to defend the knight, who has betrayed her, she exclaims :

"Why think of me? But he,—his woe!
His hope of heaven will ye rob from him?"

She claims for him the right of repentance, the benefit of Christ's blood, the appeal to divine mercy, which can forgive more than man can sin :

"See me, the virgin ; he hath blasted
All my young bloom by one fell stroke,—
In secret love my whole soul fated
For him whose gleam my life's strings broke :
I pray for him, his life, his hope of heaven ;
His mournful steps to sure repentance guide !
The power of faith to him be newly given,
Whereas for him the dear Redeemer died!"

And the heroic virgin gains the life of her beloved. What divine or human sternness could have resisted virtue so persuasive and so eloquent in love? Touched and confounded, all draw back, and Tannhäuser, crushed to earth by such a love, whose pure glow bids hope spring again upon the very brink of sheer despair, rushes forth to join the procession of pilgrims on their way to Rome, there to seek pardon for his fearful sins.

Through long days and still longer nights did the princess of Thuringia wait for his return, praying, weeping, hoping. One evening, as she was kneeling at the foot of an image of the Virgin, in the same valley where the landgrave had before recovered him, the pilgrims, with whom he had set out by the same road for Rome, came along on their way home. Transported with joy, she stands up to see whether Tannhäuser is among them. She finds him not. . . . She sinks down again before the holy virgin, the comforter of the afflicted, and in one of those prayers, which lift the soul up with it, she proceeds :

O blessed Virgin, hear my anguish !
To thee, exalted one, I pray !
O let me here no longer languish,
But call me from this earth away !
Grant, that I angel-pure may rise
To thy blest realm above the skies !—

If ever idle dream were turning
My foolish heart away from thee,—
If any germ of sinful yearning
Or worldly passion stirred in me,—
With thousand pangs I still have wrestled
To crush the sins that in me nestled.

But, if some would not leave me wholly,
Yet may I still thy mercy feel,
That I, with spirit meek and lowly,
A worthy maid to thee may kneel,
Thy mercy's richest boon to pray
For him ; to wipe his guilt away !—

As she rises, to walk up the hill of the castle, Wolfram desires in vain to accompany her. Alone upon the earth, she loves only solitude, since for her there blooms no consolation more.

In the meantime the unhappy, the renowned guilty one returns. But who under the tattered garments of this pilgrim, with forlorn look and tottering step, would recognize the splendid vanquisher of so many rivals ! It is with difficulty that even Wolfram discerns his features under this sallow paleness. Eager to learn his history, he questions him. Tannhäuser answers him only by ironically asking the way to the accursed grotto. Thrilled with horror, Wolfram, however, does not give up the man whom Elizabeth loves ; he does not allow himself to be discouraged, but continues to question him, and the debilitated pilgrim gives him, in the bitter remorse of his heart, a description of his pilgrimage :

With heart-felt zeal, such as no penitent
Had ever felt, I sought the way to Rome.
An Angel in me, ah ! had stoutly wrestled
With my poor pride of sin, and shook it off !—

The weary way of the most down-bent pilgrim
Walking beside me, I found far too easy :—
If his foot pressed the tender grass of meadows,
My naked sole would seek sharp thorn or stone ;—
Or drank he at cool rills 'neath bushy shadows,
I sucked the noonday sun's hot glow alone ;
If he sent up his pious prayers to heaven,
My blood would I to God's high glory shed ;—

Slept he in hospitable inn at even,
My weary limbs made snow and ice their bed :—
All Italy's fair fields around me spreading,
Blindfold I went, the miracle unheeding :
Such pains I sought, such rugged ways unbeaten,
That I my inward Angel's tears might sweeten !
At Rome I sought the holy place straightway,
And on the threshold low in prayer I lay :—

The morning broke :—then all the bells were ringing,
And hymns celestial thro' the air descended ;
O then new hopes within my soul were springing,
For grace to all the welcome sounds portended.
God's minister I saw ; around him pressing
Great multitudes were kneeling in the dust ;
Thousands dismissed he with his holy blessing,
Pardon'd they rose, all filled with joy and trust.—
I too approached ; with drooping head and lowly Accused myself of every thought unholy,
Of evil lusts in which my soul did languish,
Lusts, that defied all penance and all pains !
I called on him, in tones of wildest anguish,
To grant deliverance from those fiery chains.—

And he whom thus I prayed, began :
"Hast thou such sinful passion felt ?
Hast hell's own fire set thee aglow ?
Hast in the mount of Venus dwelt ?
Then thou art damn'd to endless woe !
For as this staff within my hand
Its leafy bloom can ne'er regain,
So ne'er canst thou, a burning brand
Plucked forth from hell, find grace again !"

I sank annihilated ; reeling
My senses left me. When I roused me there,
Cold night lay brooding o'er the gloomy square ;
Far off I heard glad hymns of mercy pealing :—
O how I loathed their sickening sound !
Wildly I hurried from the treacherous ground ;

Again I seek th' enchanted spot,
Thee, Venus, and thy fairy grot !
&c., &c.

The chronicles, which report the answer of the bishop, further add that, after the knight, rejected with such inexorable sternness, had returned to his fatherland, to give himself up again to the old dissatisfactions, the unsympathizing priest one day found his staff of almond wood in bloom, proving that even dead wood could, if need were, be re-animated, and that a repentant heart was not to be rejected.

Tannhäuser, by the inexorable sentence given over to desperation, since he could find no hearing in ears deaf to pity, seeks again the Venus grotto. He tries to discover the secret path. . . . and the song of the syrens, the voice of the goddess let themselves be heard again. With the despair of one burthened with the curse of excommunication, he rushes toward them. Wolfram with all his strength holds him back, but cannot break the accursed charm, until he pronounces the name of Elizabeth. Again this pure name exercises its magical and saving power. Instantly the impure vision vanishes. The melodies so full of a seductive grace die away, and Tannhäuser, with the same love, the same hope, utters that name once more. At this moment a funeral procession is seen approaching ; it bears to her last resting-place her, whose sole desire had been to live and die for him. He sinks down on the coffin, wherein roasts a victim, that had borne every sorrow to expiate his sins. He sinks to the ground, he dies. He is saved.

Music Abroad.

COLOGNE. A most interesting relic of Beethoven was published on the occasion of the centenary of his birth. It is the announcement of his first public appearance at Cologne, and belongs to a native of the place. The Kölnische Zeitung has printed it, with all its peculiarities of style and orthography. Here is an English version as close as the difference between the two idioms will allow :

Avertissement.—To-day, date the 26 Martii, 1778, in the Hall of the Musical Academy, in the Sternstrasse, Beethoven, the Court-tenorist of the Elector of Cologne, will have the honor of introducing two of his scholars, namely, Mlle. Averdore, Court-artist, and his (Beethoven's) little son, aged six. The former will have the honor of waiting on the public with various beautiful concertos and trios, in which he flatters himself, he shall afford perfect pleasure to all his high patrons, since both have enjoyed the privilege of appearing before the whole Court, to its great amusement. To commence at five o'clock in the evening. Ladies and gentlemen nonsubscribers pay a florin. Tickets are to be procured at the above-mentioned Hall of the Musical Academy, and also of Herr Claren, on the Bach im Mühlstein.

It will perhaps strike any one inclined to be critical that the Court-tenorist, Beethoven, thus makes out his "little son" six years old in March, 1778. Were this correct, the celebrated Ludwig would not have first seen the light of day in 1770 but in 1772. We may be permitted to assume that it was a father's natural vanity which represented the "wonder-child" as two years younger than he really was.

LEIPZIG,—where more than in any city in the world good music is at home,—naturally shows the richest programme for the Beethoven week. The following compositions of the master were performed :

1. Sunday, the 11th December, in the Thomas-Kirche, by Riedel's Verein, Missa Solemnis, Op. 123. 2. Monday the 12th, in the Conservatory, song by Gellert : "Gott, deine Güte !" Sonata for the Pianoforte, Op. 100, E major ; Trio, Op. 97, B flat major ; "Abendlied für eine Singstimme !" "Elegischer Gesang" for four voices ; Menuet and Finale from the Stringed Quartet in G major, Op. 60, No. 3. 3. Tuesday, the 13th, Chamber Music in the Gewandhaus : Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin, G major, Op. 30, No. 8, Quartet for Stringed Instruments, C sharp minor, Op. 131 ; Sonata for Pianoforte, E minor, Op. 90 ; Septet, Op. 20. 4. Wednesday, the 14th, in the Theatre, music to Egmont. 5. Thursday, the 15th, Concert at the Gewandhaus :—Overture to Coriolan ; "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Op. 112 ; Triple Concerto ; Ninth Symphony. 6. Friday, the 16th. In the Theatre,

Die Ruinen von Athen; Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, ballet. 7. Saturday, the 17th. In the Theatre: Fidelio. It may, moreover, be mentioned that, on the 11th December, the Amateur Orchestral Union performed the overture, No. 1, to Leonore, and the music to Egmont; while the concert of Chamber Music, given on the 18th December, by Riedel's Verein, was especially devoted to the great master; the pieces executed being Stringed Quartet, F minor, Op. 95; Pianoforte Sonata, in C minor, Op. 111; Liederkreis "an die ferne Geliebte;" and the Quartet in C sharp minor.

VIENNA.—The descendants of Beethoven living here—namely: his niece, Mme. Naske-Beethoven, her two married daughters, Mes. Weldinger and Helmler, together with an unmarried daughter and a granddaughter—attended, in boxes placed at their service by the Committee, all the performances of the Centenary Festival. The latter attracted a large number of visitors, among whom may be mentioned MM. Lens, Nohl, and Thayer, Beethoven's biographers; M. Dessoef, the Russian composer; and Dr. Bach, director of the Morzeum, Salzburg. The Corporation of Vienna have not been forgetful of the great composer's birth any more than have the art-lovers, more especially so called, of the capital, though they have selected their own way of proceeding. They refused to take any share in the festivities, especially the grand banquet, but they voted a sum of 5,000 florins to the Beethoven Fund, for the assistance of poor and talented musicians.—A number of well-known musicians living in Berlin sent from that capital a laurel wreath, with the request that Dr. Standhartner would lay it upon Beethoven's grave. The ribbon of the wreath bore inscribed the following names:—Clara Schumann, Joseph and Amalie Joachim, Julie and Anna von Asten, Bernhard Scholz, de Ahna, Robert Radecke, Max Bruch, Friedrich Kiel, and Ernest Rudorf. On the 17th ult. Dr. Standhartner personally performed the honorable service demanded of him.—A Russian lady, Mme. de Panschultschef, to express her delight at the Beethoven Centenary Festival, has presented Herr Herbeck with a conductor's stick, richly adorned with diamonds and rubies. It is to be used by him when conducting the Egmont music. By the way, talking of Herr Herbeck, the Emperor has signed the decree, appointing him director of the Imperial Opera-house.—*Corr. Lond. ### Concerts.

THEODORE THOMAS'S Series of "Seven Symphonies and Popular Concerts" came to an end last Saturday (afternoon and evening), having given a great deal of pure enjoyment to a great many people. The audiences were always large, once or twice filling the Boston Music Hall completely. Many went to hear the nobler selections from the great masters played with such perfection as to time and tune, good quality of tone in every instrument, true phrasing in the violins, fullness and richness of tone in the middle strings (unusual in our orchestras), exquisite precision, delicacy and verve in execution, fine gradation of light and shade, &c., as one can count upon with certainty, and all the time, only in such a permanent organization as this is, composed of superior artists, picked men all of them, whose daily business it is to play together in this way, under true leadership, the whole year round. For these are not musicians who come together as an orchestra (in the higher sense) for ten or a dozen concerts in the winter only, and who drudge in theatres, street bands, or dancing parties all the rest of the time. To this orchestral work the leader and his men devote their lives. Rare technical excellence, as well as sympathetic intelligence in their interpretation of all forms, styles and individualities of composition are the natural result. In this sense, as we have said before, Mr. Thomas has the only real Orchestra in the whole country. Every lover, therefore, of the Symphonies and Overtures of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, &c., is glad to hear them in so clear and smooth a rendering; while hundreds of others, less deep and earnest in their loves and likings, seeking amusement mainly and keen sensuous delight, go for the momentary gay excitement of the light and popular pieces, skilfully selected, and brought home with such brilliant tone and thrilling accent. These concerts contain always something for all tastes—of course excepting positively low tastes; always a good share of the choicest matter mingled with,—or this time commonly preceding—the ear-tickling lighter strains, which hardly cost attention, certainly no thought, and the startling effect pieces which rouse the dull and stupefy the finer sense. There is much for the truest music lover in such entertainments; and yet no miscellaneous programme, as a whole, can satisfy a really deep, true musical desire. That is not, in the highest sense, a genuine artistic occasion, in which there is not a certain unity of design, an uncompromising refinement and nobility of tone (admitting of relief and contrast more effective than is possible to any medley), pervading the whole; giving the programme as a whole such symmetry, consistency and unity as we find typified in the successive movements of a Symphony.

We have already spoken of the first two Thomas Concerts. The third (the crowded matinée of Saturday, Jan. 14) opened with the Tannhäuser Overture; followed by the beautiful Adagio from Beethoven's "Prometheus" music (with a real harp!); the "Invitation à la Danse" by Weber (Berlioz's orchestration); and the "Preludes" by Liszt. So far mostly brilliant and modern, and of course brilliantly brought out. Then came, brightest of all, and genial, worth a dozen "Preludes," the familiar Overture to "Tell." Then that study of pianissimo effect, the little Schumann Traumerei, which they who have heard it to weariness must hear again for the sake of the eager curiosity and the young wonder of new comers, who commonly demand a repetition, and commonly get another bit of whisper music (Haydn Serenade perhaps) instead. Then came the fair pianist with the compressed lips and thoughtful brow, Miss ANNA MEHLIG,—an infallible attraction to the Thomas Concerts, and played, as she can play, a Nocturne of Chopin, in F sharp, and the wild Galop Chromatique of Liszt;—something more too, we forget what, for encore,—perhaps the "Soirées de Vienne" by Tausig. There still remained Strauss Polkas, a brace of them, and a flaring, blazing, crashing torch dance (Fackeltanz) of Meyerbeer, No. 1, in B, in which the Bass Tuba burlesques a melody with its big, bloated tones.

Fourth Concert (Evening of same day). A particularly good one. If only for the privilege of hearing once more, and in the fine rendering of these musicians, that almost Symphony of Schumann's, the suite of movements: "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," op. 52, first heard here in a Harvard Concert last year. The Scherzo was done to a charm. Still greater privilege, if not so rare, was it to hear the Romanza and Rondo of the wonderful E minor Concerto of Chopin, performed by Miss MEHLIG. A new piece, called "Tanz-Momente," by John Herbeck, a sort of poetic reproduction of the spirit of the ball room, not a set of strains to dance by, were worth another hearing. The Overtures to "Midsummer Night's Dream," and to "Fra Diavolo," were like beauties when they look their best. The Variations from Beethoven's Quartet, op. 18, by all the strings, given as perfectly as if there but one upon a part, were enjoyed in breathless silence. A Serenade for Flute and French Horn, (Messrs. WEINER and SCHMITZ), displayed both instruments in an enviable light. More perfect horn playing we never heard. For the rest, another Waltz and pair of Polkas, all by Strauss.

Fifth Concert, Wednesday Afternoon, 18th. The chief attraction was Miss Mehlig's marvellously clear, sure, firm, poetic rendering of the familiar Mendelssohn Concerto in G-minor. Next to that in interest were the pieces from Beethoven's Septet (Theme and variations, Scherzo and Finale), as played by all the strings, with clarinet, bassoon and horn parts doubled; one of the Thomas specialties which is always welcome and deserves to be. The Overtures were Spohr's to Jessonda, and Rossini's to Semiramide,—the latter particularly worth hearing from an orchestra so rich in mellow horn tones. A newly arrived violinist, Mr. CHARLES HAMM, young and modest in appearance, proved himself an artist by his playing of the Scena Cantante of Spohr. The remarkable trombonist, Mr. F. LEETECH, "roared" a Fantasia (by Gottermann), "as gently as any nightingale;" and then the pianissimists had their delight in the Abendlied by Schumann and the Serenade by Haydn. Another Strauss Waltz, another brace of Strauss Polkas (notable for their inventive nomenclature, if the endless family of children do all look alike and leave essentially the same impression), and a "Marche Indienne" by Meyerbeer, filled the cup brim full for those who had not gone away already satiated.

Sixth. Last Saturday Afternoon. That model Symphony by Mozart, in G-minor, in a model rendering, opened the feast most satisfactorily. Miss Mehlig's principal selection was from the B-minor Concerto of Hummel, op. 89. First the Larghetto, rather tamely fluted, with thin, weak orchestral introduction; then the Rond. finale, a most protracted, monotonously continuous stretch of flying passage work, graceful and meaningless, immensely difficult, which always sounded as if coming to an end, but still kept on. Of course, Hummel was a master, and his compositions all musician-like; but somehow, with a few grand exceptions like the Septet, the quickening spark seems wanting in them, and they have soon grown to be respectably old-fashioned. It was a rare example of sustained and even execution on the part of the pianist. Later in the Concert she played a Nocturne in G by Chopin, and for a curiosity, an Etude à Concert by Rubinstein, with the qualifying epithet "infernale," to which it did seem well entitled. This is the piece which was described on a recent programme of Miss Krebs, in New York, as a study "on false notes," puzzling many a reader. The mystery was soon solved. It consists of a series of break-neck arpeggios, which rushing upwards, strike with emphasis the semi-tone below or above the tone proper to the harmony,—a mere exaggeration of the appoggiatura in fact, and nothing "false" about it but the name. A "Cavalry March" by Schubert proved to be an effective and exciting orchestral transcription of one of his four-hand marches for piano. The "Preciosa" Overture by Weber, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Scherzo, were delicate, delicious pictures. The Waltz this time was for our "Sub-hub" neighbors, who love to come to town for matinées (judging by its title of "Vorstadler") and by Lanner. (Is this the difference between him and Strauss?) The Polkas, though, were metropolitan, of Strauss; and one was "Ladies' heart" and one "sent in,"—rare ingenuity of names! The final crash came in another Fackeltanz by Meyerbeer (No. 3, in C-minor).

Same Evening. The seventh and last concert had for programme this:

Overture. Fidelio .....	Beethoven.
Maurerische Trauer Musik. (Kochel, 447).....	Mozart.
Concerto for Piano, D minor.....	Mendelssohn
Miss Anna Mehlig and Orchestra.
Scherzo. Op. 19, (new).....	Goldmark.
Overture. Lurline .....	Wallace.
Traumerel . [by request].....	Schumann.
Waltz. Sphaeren Klänge .....	Strauss.
Ave Maria. [for Orchestra by F. Lux].....	Schubert.
Ballet Music. Kling Manfied (new).....	Reinecke.
Polka Masurka. Städt und Land , {.....	Strauss.
Polka Schnell. Blitz und Welle , {.....	Strauss.
Marche Hongroise. Rakoczy .....	Berlioz.

MR. B. J. LANG'S first of four concerts at the Globe Theatre, on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 19, drew a very choice and (for a chamber concert) a large audience. There were at least three hundred good listeners, seated mostly in the parquette of the handsome theatre, in comfortable seats, with everything cozy and harmonious about them, and conducive to those "fits of easy transmission" which hold of musical as well as of electro magnetic spheres. And to auditors so seated, and not under any gallery, we think the belief expressed upon the programme, that for such a number the Globe Theatre would "prove to be particularly good for music," was confirmed. The selections (made "with special consideration for the younger class of concert goers," that is, with a view to give fresh auditors a chance to hear those standard, sterling works of chamber music, which, from their very familiarity to more experienced music-lovers, are apt to figure for a while less frequently in other programmes) were as follows:

Quintet, Op. 108.....Mozart.
Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3, (Piano, Violin and Cello).
Beethoven.
Scherzo in B flat minor, Op. 31, for Piano.....Chopin.
Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, Op. 25.....Mendelssohn.

The beautiful Mozart Quintet,—the one in which the clarinet plays a leading part (Mr. RYAN, with his brethren of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club), was artistically rendered, the instruments being in fine sympathy with one another, except that the reed tones now and then stood out a little too boldly in the front. The piece gave a fine healthy zest to the beginning. The early Trio of Beethoven was gracefully and cleanly executed by Messrs. LANG, SCHULTZE and WULF FRIES. Mr. Lang seized the spirit of the Scherzo by Chopin, and conveyed it to his hearers so well that one scarcely thought of the masterly ease of execution it involved. For the Mendelssohn Concerto he had but a Quintet accompaniment, Mr. EDWARD HEINDL's double bass forming a background to Messrs. Schulze, Meissel, Ryan and Fries. This, of course, after the full orchestral accompaniment of the day before, recalled the old comparison of an engraving to a painting, but it lent a good support and set the solo in a strong light. Mr. Lang's was a very fervent, carefully studied, finished and intelligent performance. Our sole misgiving was, that there was now and then a little over-refining of expression in the tender passages, and almost too fiercely passionate an accent in the fiery Finale. Perhaps the conscientious labor was too well prepared; perhaps it was our colder mood. But it was a thoroughly refined performance, and, like the whole occasion, gave a fine and keen enjoyment to all present. The grouping of artists on the stage was picturesque and musical to look upon.

Mr. Lang's programme for next Thursday includes a string Quartet by Beethoven in A major (one of the six in Op. 18); Beethoven's first piano Concerto in C, Op. 15; the Chopin Ballade in A flat; and Mendelssohn's C-minor Trio. These concerts come in pleasant alternation with the Harvard Symphony Concerts.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of this week (too late for fuller notice now), offered: The introduction to Wagner's "Lohengrin;" the Aria, "Erbarme dich," from Bach's L'Assion Music, sang by Mrs. BARRY; the G-minor Concerto of MOSCHLES, played (for the first time in Boston, in honor of the master's memory, who died last March) by Mr. PARKER; the "Scotch" Symphony by Mendelssohn; songs new to our concert rooms, ("Rose, Meer and Sonne," Schumann; "Verdi prati," Handel; "In the Spring," Franz); and Overture to "Tell," Rossini.

The programme for the Seventh Concert (Thursday, Feb. 9), is as follows:—

Part I. Third Symphony ("Cologne," in E-flat, Schumann. Part II. Fantasie-Overture to Moore's "Paradise and the Peri," Bennett, (first time in this country); Piano Concerto, in F-minor, Chopin, (HUGO LEONHARD); Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann.

There has been a fortnight of GERMAN OPERA at the Boston Theatre, closing to-night. The company is large, and the performances have been marked by many excellencies and many faults. But the enterprise has merited better patronage than it has had (with the exception of two or three nights), if only for offering so rich a repertoire: for it is something rare indeed to have an opportunity of hearing in one fortnight Fidelio, Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, Figaro's Hochzeit, Der Freyschütz, the Huguenots, Halevy's "Jewess," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" (with CARL FORMES for Falstaff); Flotow's "Alessandro Stradella," Gounod's "Faust," "Martha," and for the great gratification of the curious, Wagner's Tannhaeuser.

PRAGUE.—On the occasion of the Beethoven Centenary, the Emperor of Austria bestowed the Cross of the Franz-Joseph Order upon Dr. A. W. Ambros, in recognition of that gentleman's exertions in the field of musically historical investigation.—The rehearsals of Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger have begun, but there is not much probability that the work will be produced before the first of February, at the earliest.

SALZBURG.—The Beethoven Jubilee was duly celebrated here. On the 17th, there was an extra performance at the theatre, when the programme included Lenau's poem on Beethoven; the chorus of Prisoners (sung by the members of the Liedertafel) from Fidelio; and Goethe's Egmont—of course with Beethoven's music. On the 18th, the members of the Liedertafel and Singacademic, combined, gave a performance of the Missa Solennis in D.

GRATZ.—The Beethoven Centenary was celebrated in a very appropriate manner. Herr Kreibitz, the manager of the Landschaftliches Theatre, gave a performance on the 16th December of Fidelio, the receipts being devoted to the Musicians' Pension Fund. The house was exceedingly full, as it was, also, on the following day, the 17th, when the attraction was Goethe's Egmont, with Beethoven's music. A Festival Concert got up by Professor Augustus Pottlikewise on the 17th, was most numerously attended.

HAMBURG.—In honor of the Centenary of Beethoven's birth, none but pieces of his composition were played at the third Philharmonic Concert on the 16th December. The Sinfonia Eroica, and the third Leonore Overture were executed in a spirited manner by the band. Mlle. Clara Schumann played the E flat Concerto and the grand Variations in C minor. Mlle. Marianna Brandt, from the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, sang the scene and air, "Ah, perfido," and three Scotch songs, with violin and violoncello accompaniment. This young lady, who is a pupil of Mme. Viardot-Garcia appeared, also, in Fidelio. Both in the concert-room and on the stage she was much applauded.

MUNICH.—The Theatre Royal devoted three days to the Beethoven Centenary. On Friday, the 16th December, there was a model performance of chamber music in the Residenztheater; on Saturday, there was a Symphony supplemented by a Mass; and on Sunday, the 18th, Goethe's Egmont, with Beethoven's music.—The Centenary was commemorated at the Volkstheater by the performance of the piece entitled Beethoven, and written by Herr Schmidt. By the way, his Majesty the King of Bavaria has forbidden any of Offenbach's operas being [for the future performed at this theatre.

"Tannhaeuser" at the Boston Theatre.

[From the Daily Advertiser, Jan. 21.]

The "Tannhaeuser" of Richard Wagner was given entire for the first time in Boston last evening. The audience was immense, occupying every seat and much of the standing-room below the amphitheatre, and it was so earnestly bent upon being enthusiastic that it took all suitable and many unsuitable occasions to burst into rapturous applause. We do not propose to enter into an elaborate analysis or criticism of "Tannhaeuser" at this time. Our readers have had for some time a correct general idea of Wagner's mode of expressing his thoughts in music; and many of them have doubtless long desired to improve an opportunity for better acquaintance like that of last evening. And without admitting a tithe of what the admirers of Wagner claim for Tannhaeuser, we must express our sense of obligation to the company who have set the work before us in so acceptable a shape. It is something to gratify the curiosity, even if the ear be tortured and the mind wearied in the process; and the most bigoted "classicist" in music could not listen to a complete performance of "Tannhaeuser" without gaining much knowledge and experiencing some upliftings of the soul. The instrumentation, as all students of music know, is nothing short of marvellous. In the midst of recitatives of the dullest order of vocal composition, one can always turn to the orchestra and become thoroughly interested, if he be not absolutely pleased. In very many passages, and indeed in some whole scenes, it is impossible not to be impressed with the idea that Wagner has deliberately subordinated the voices to the instruments; and sometimes he seems to have forgotten his singers altogether, so completely are they swallowed up by the volume of orchestral sound. How uncouth and barbaric some of his instrumental effects are, our readers do not need to be told; if Richard Wagner were deprived of the cymbals, the drums and the triangles, he would be helpless enough, no doubt; but still the fact remains of his possessing an astonishing capacity and ingenuity in elaborating his ideas through the medium of the orchestra, and in his most inspired moments he attains to a subtle expressiveness in this kind to which no [?] operatic composer—Mozart always excepted—has ever reached.

In other respects many of the excellencies and deficiencies of "Tannhaeuser" are on the surface. Wagner has the slenderest vein of melodic genius to begin with, and with five possible exceptions there is not a real air in the opera. Tannhaeuser's "Stets soll nur dir, nur dir mein Lied erklingen," of the first act, the march which introduces the fourth scene in the second act, and Wolfram's "Hymn to the Evening Star," are worthy to be called airs, and, though not melodically rich, have a peculiar nobleness and elevation of quality which are very stirring. The melody, also, of the Pilgrims' Chorus is so grand and uplifting as to be worthy of the isolation of fame which it has obtained among the numbers of the opera. The vast body of the work is given up to recitative, through great, sandy wastes of which the singers are constantly compelled to wade. In many places, however, a fine melodic treatment, if we may so say, is used without the form of a rounded melody, and, in not a few instances, astonishing and most impressive climaxes of passion are reached by this method alone,—the best example of which is afforded by Tannhaeuser's description of his interview with the Holy Father in Rome, "ihn durch sich Gott verkündigt" and the agony and despair of his rejected repentance; and a very beautiful illustration of the capacity of this form of composition for the expression of pure and exalted emotion is given in Wolfram's song at the Landgrave's festival, "Blick ich umher in diesem edlen Kreise." The composer's greatest powers are exhibited, and by far the strongest points of this opera are seen in the concerted pieces which come at or near the conclusion of each act. The chief of these, a septet and chorus in the first act and an octet and chorus in the second, are miracles [?] of musical composition, the simplest framework of melody being taken and over this a vast fabric of harmonic combination being raised. The effect produced by these numbers, as one by one the voices are wrought into the fabric of the piece, each distinct in its form and character, yet all uniting in a single inspiring purpose, as voices and instruments intensify and increase in volume, and as all at length sweep with an on rushing crescendo to a grand climax of sound, is indescribably exciting. We dwell, however, too long upon the excellencies of the work, great as these are; its defects, in addition to those already suggested, are legion. If "Tannhäuser" be taken as an exemplar, Wagner's capacity for the expression of feeling in music is narrow enough. Three kinds of emotions he seems to be able to give utterance to, namely: rage, despair and spiritual aspiration. If he can do anything else this opera gives very little indication of it. The music assigned to the part of Venus, which should embody the passion, fervor, and fascination of sensual love, is worse than tame; it is contradictory to the sentiment of the character and the scene; and throughout the work there are abundant examples of a similar incapacity in other directions. If Wagner's genius can be proved to be lofty, it must also be admitted to be painfully cramped and narrowly circumscribed.

Considering the immense difficulties of the work, it was very well presented last evening. There were, of course, many short comings and there was not a little singing out of tune, in which Franz, the Landgrave of the opera, was painfully conspicuous. Mme. Lichtmay's Elizabeth was noble in conception and performance. Carl Bernard as Tannhäuser though again vocally inadequate to his part, acted with great fervor, and in his great declamation of the third act, of which we have already spoken, reached a pitch of tremendous power and intensity. Vierling as Wolfram appeared to far greater advantage than at any previous performance, and gave an impersonation to both the acting and singing to which it was impossible to take exception. Nearly all the others acquitted themselves with credit. The Venus of Mlle. Roemer was not absolutely bad, but probably no one was disturbed at the loss of her scene in the last part, although the dramatic continuity of the act was completely ruined by the omission. The orchestra did finely with their very difficult music; and the choruses and concerted pieces were generally rendered with the greatest fire and with respectable precision.

From the Transcript:

"Tannhäuser" is certainly a good specimen of romanticism in music, but it does not signalize an operatic independence and reform, as many have been led to expect; nor does it establish its composer as a chief of a lyrical school.

The intellectual nature of the composer's ideas and designs and the lyrical quality of his product in this opera can scarcely be questioned. It is all very rich and splendid composition, and with its breadth and strength and its ingenious presentation of scene and drama, is a piece of musical painting that appeals very strongly to the imagination, and is full of dramatic expression. The forms, however, are every way conventional, and the really strong points of the opera bear the pronounced style of the modern school, and all the combination music of the work is a perpetual reminder of Meyerbeer and kindred composers.

Vocally the work is rather weak—that is, there is no melody of distinct beauty and saliency, showing a creative faculty in that direction, and all the solo numbers of the opera seem to strive against a dull vein of musical thought, and seemed to be handled with no interior intelligence or happy intention. In his concerted music in this opera Wagner is far more able and strong. This is judicious and effective, smack as it may of imitation and conventionalism; as witness the finale of the First Act and the contest of the bards in the Second Act. In all these situations he writes with a rhapsody that disarms all criticism, and a force of thought leading to supreme climaxes that are marvellous in their sway upon the hearer.

But after all Wagner's true field is the orchestra; his nature is instrumental and not vocal; and in this province he is all alive, all various, individual and creative. Whatever failure there may be to give the dominant sentiment and passion of the drama through the language of the voice, the passage of the piece is beautifully and wondrously accompanied, colored and indicated through the orchestral medium. This is dramatic music in the best sense; and one can well withdraw from viewing the scene upon the stage to take in the wealth and harmony of instruments as they are wrought to lyric uses betraying at every step an uncontrollable liberty if not an outright inspiration.

From the Evening Gazette:

The work, in any event, is not to be dismissed with a sneer. In spite of all its distortions of harmony, its ever-recurring dissonances, and its perpetual striving for effect, there is much that is impressive, and some of the best effects are reached by legitimate and simple means. The choral which calls Tannhäuser back to his duty is of celestial beauty. The song in praise of Venus could not be more appropriately conceived. And the instrumentation, with all its crashes and shrieks, is never thoughtlessly scored. The march, which begins the second act, is, next to the choral, the simplest composition in the work. It is very likely that, when Herr Wagner is in his dulcet, he thinks himself in his most interesting, moods. The songs by the competing minstrels in the Wartburg hall are models of dullness, (?) being neither chant, recitative nor melody, judged by an example of preceding writers.

But Wagner claims that he is to be bound by no example, and that he is preaching a new musical religion. Still, one is hardly able to hold a clear judgment after a single hearing, and so we hope that the opera will soon be repeated. The orchestra did far better than we had been led, by its previous efforts, to expect. Herr Bernard, as the vacillating hero, did better than on his first appearance, but his voice is hard and dry. Mme. Lichtmay made a noble Elizabeth. Mlle. Roemer, as Venus, was by no means equal to the requirements of the rôle. The rest of the cast was as follows:—Herrmann, Herr Franz; Wolfram, Herr Vierling; Walter, Herr Habelman; Blüher, Wilhelm Formes; and the Shepherd, Mlle. Haffner. Each one seemed inspired by an earnest endeavor to give a conscientious rendering of the score, which is so strongly charged with inharmonious sequences as to lead many to think that there was a constant false intonation by all of the singers. It would have been matter for little wonder, indeed, had they been all astray from the pitch, the rejection of the idea of tonality being one of the composer's occasional idiosyncrasies.

From the Sunday Times:

If a first-rate elocutionist were to read Browning's "Ring and the Book" before such an audience as assembled in the Boston Theatre on Friday evening, there would, no doubt, be a small portion of the auditors that would sufficiently comprehend the author's purpose to be impressed with its breadth of thought and dramatic power; but how differently would the same audience receive "Himlet." So with Wagner's "Tannhäuser." A great portion of the very large audience that listened to its performance on Friday evening were, no doubt, deeply impressed with the earnest purpose, the genius and skill displayed throughout the work; but we feel sure that they were convinced that its distance from the range of human sympathies, its continual abstractions, its heaviness, its lack of vitality, would always stand in the way of anything like even a moderate popularity.

And yet it is a work of great power and beauty, the production of a man of genius, of thought, of a very high and earnest purpose, and of a most thorough musician, and should not be judged lightly after the too slight acquaintance of a single hearing. We feel confident, however, that, interesting as the work is to all thoughtful minds, the same lack of vitalising elements that have stood in the way of its general acceptance everywhere but in Berlin will also render its performance inappreciative and critical Boston a notable rarity. Wagner's genius is not lyrical, and he very seldom indulges in melodic writing. The opera consists chiefly of a series of long recitatives, cast in a very dramatic form, very often of a noble strength and beauty, and very often long, uninteresting, and consequently tedious. The story is told by a series of solos; the picture is painted in deep, broad masses, and in a very serious and sombre key, into which but seldom flashes a ray of high light. In the voluptuous scenes the music is coldly philosophical and full of abstractions, as in the very first scene, where the hottest blooded of mortals would have found no difficulty in resisting the songs of both Venus and the Sirens.

The strength of the work undoubtedly lies in its choruses, which are largely conceived and broadly and effectively built up, and its marvellous wealth of instrumentation. The familiar "Chorus of Pilgrims," the finale to the first act, and the opening chorus of the fourth scene in the second act, where the theme of the march is very skilfully worked up, are all noble examples of chorus writing, and are managed with a true musicianly skill. Many of the scenes are very effectively conceived and arranged, showing that Wagner, who writes his own librettos, is an artist in a very high sense, who knows the value of contrasts and subtle combinations.

We can fully appreciate the energy and hard, conscientious labor that must have been brought to bear on the production of such a work, and the German company is deserving of the highest praise for its enterprise in bringing this opera to the notice of the musical public. When the ungracious task of learning and singing such an immense amount of music that will nowhere sing itself is considered, the performance must be considered as in many respects a remarkable one. The whole work, complicated and devoid of movement as it is, went off with astonishing smoothness, leaving but little to be desired save in the orchestral parts, which sometimes lacked smoothness and completeness. Mme. Lichtmay's Elizabeth was a very noble performance, abounding in strong points, and marked with a very high conception and artistic execution. She delivered her recitatives with great energy and power. Especially in the intercession for Tannhäuser and in the prayer to the Virgin, she sang with great purity, tenderness and emotion.

Herr Bernard dispelled all doubts as to his vocal capabilities that may have been felt on his first appearance, and gave the trying and oftentimes unglorious music of Tannhäuser in a very intelligent manner. The audience were too well nigh exhausted to fully appreciate the height of intense and passionate utterance to which he rose in his last long recitative. We have seldom heard anything so fine (?) on the operatic stage. The other solo parts were very acceptably rendered, and the choruses were all grandly and effectively given.

Something about Beethoven's Last Days.

BY DR. FERDINAND HILLER.*

Though I am no Nestor, yet there are probably few persons living who have had, as I have, the happiness of seeing and speaking to the greatest artist of the present century. When I was a somewhat precocious youth, like most musicians, I was fortunate enough, during the years 1825-27, to be under the instruction of that excellent man, Hummel, at Weimar, and had the privilege of accompanying him on a professional trip, which he made, in the year 1827, by way of Leipsic and Dresden, to Vienna. It was a cold winter, with heavy falls of snow, and we had to suffer much discomfort upon the road. But I still remember with delight our journey from Dresden to Prague. We travelled in broad daylight by sledge, and a pleasing feeling of youthful joyousness comes over me, when I recall to mind how, by the side of my beloved master, I drove through the white mountains of Bohemia, as they gleamed in the rays of the cold sun. On Tuesday, the 6th March, 1827, we arrived, fatigued and jolted to bits, in the Imperial city. No later than the 8th, we paid Beethoven a visit.

Though, at that period, people heard altogether less of the greatest men than they now hear every week of the smallest, intelligence of Beethoven's illness had reached us at Weimar. He was suffering from dropsy. We heard from the artists whom Hummel visited in Vienna the worst accounts of him. His condition, according to some, was hopeless; according to others, inexpressibly sad. We were told of total inability to hear; and of continually increasing suspicion of everybody; to which were now added bodily suffering—unsuccessful operations—dejection and solitude; nay, more, an exterior that almost inspired terror. With this preparation, we drove out to the suburb. Traversing a spacious antichamber, in which high presses sustained thick heaps of music tied up together, we reached (how my heart beat!) Beethoven's sitting-room, and were not slightly astonished to find the master, to all appearance, quite comfortable, seated at the window. He wore a long grey dressing-gown, at that moment completely open, and high boots reaching to the knees. Reduced by his sad illness, he seemed to me, as he stood up, of tall stature; he was not shaved, and his thick, half grey hair fell in disorder about his temples. His features assumed a most friendly and bright expression, when he perceived Hummel, and he appeared extremely delighted. The two embraced each other in the most cordial manner. Hummel introduced me. Beethoven was thoroughly kind, and I enjoyed the privilege of seating myself opposite him at the window.

We all know that conversation was maintained with Beethoven partly in writing; he spoke, but those to whom he spoke had to write down their questions and answers. For this purpose, thick packets of ordinary quarto-sized writing paper, with a lead pencil, were always lying close to him. How painful it must have been for a vivacious and even rather impatient man, like him, to be obliged to wait for every answer, and endure at every instant of the conversation a pause, during which his thinking powers, also, were, so to speak, condemned to inactivity! He followed with an eager eye the hand of the writer, and seized at a glance, rather than read, what was written. The conversation suffered, of course, very materially, in animation, from the necessity there was for visitors to write everything down.

I can scarcely blame myself, however much I may regret the fact, for not having at the time written out more at length than I did all that Beethoven said; nay, I ought, on the contrary, to feel delighted that, though only a boy of fifteen, and in a large city for the first time in my life, I retained sufficient composure to note down anything at all. For the most complete exactitude of everything I am in a position to narrate, I can conscientiously answer.

The conversation turned, at first, as usual, on things at home; on our journey and stay; on my position towards Hummel, and so on. Beethoven inquired with extraordinary interest after the state of Goethe's health, of which we were able to give him the very best account. A few days previously the great poet had written some friendly verses, referring to our journey, in my album. Poor Beethoven complained very much of his health. "I have been laid up now these four months," he exclaimed. "One's patience is at last exhausted." A great deal in Vienna did not seem to agree with his way of thinking, and he spoke in an exceedingly sharp manner on "the present taste in art," and on "the dilettanteism here, which spoils everything." Nor was the government, even in its very highest branches, spared. "Write a bookful of penitential hymns, and dedicate them to the Empress," he said, laughing discontentedly to Hummel, who, however, did not take advantage of the well-meant advice.

Hummel, who was a practical man, profited by Beethoven's momentary favorable state to make a communication requiring some time. Literary piracy then flourished luxuriantly in Germany. In the case of one of my master's Concertos (I think it was the Concerto in C major), it came to pass that the piece, of which a copy had been surreptitiously obtained from the printing-office of the legitimate publisher, had been engraved not simply after but before* the legal copies—in a word, they published it sooner than its owner had been in a position to do. Hummel wanted to petition the high Bundestag, so that a stop might be put to these disgraceful proceedings, and Beethoven's signature struck him as of the utmost importance. He sat down to explain the matter in writing, and, in the mean time, I had the honor of being allowed to continue the conversation with Beethoven. I did my best, and the master gave further utterance, in the most confidential manner, to his sadly-passionate feelings. His observations referred mostly to his nephew, of whom he was very fond, who had caused him great anxiety, and, at that time, had got involved in difficulties with the authorities about some trumpety matters—for so, at least, Beethoven, appeared to regard them. "Small thieves are hanged, but the big ones are allowed to go free," he exclaimed pettishly. Enquiring about my studies, he said, to encourage me: "We must always propagate" (fortplanzen) "art," and, on my speaking of the exclusive interest then excited in Vienna by Italian opera, he burst out with the remarkable words: "They say: vox populi vox Dei—I never thought so."

On the 13th of March, Hummel took me for the second time with him to see Beethoven. The master was in bed, apparently in great pain, and sometimes groaning deeply; despite of this, however, he talked a great deal, and in a very animated manner. He seemed to take very much to heart the fact of his not being married. On our first visit, he had joked on the subject with Hummel, whose wife he had known as a young and handsome girl. "You," he said laughingly on this occasion to Hummel, "you are lucky; you have a wife who takes care of you, and who is in love with you—but I, poor wretch!"—he added, sighing deeply. He begged Hummel, moreover, to bring his wife, who had not been able to make up her mind to come and see the man whom she had known in all his vigor, now that he was in such a state. Some one had shown him, a short time previously, a picture of the house where Haydn was born—he had it near his bed and showed it to us. "It caused me a childish delight," he said—"this cradle of so great a man!" He afterwards made a request to Hummel, regarding Schindler, subsequently so frequently mentioned. "He is a good fellow," he said, "and has taken a great deal of trouble about me. He intends giving a concert shortly, and I promised him my co-operation. But nothing will, probably, come of the promise. I should like you to do me the favor of playing on the occasion. One ought always to help on poor artists." Hummel, of course, consented. The concert took place—ten days after Beethoven's death—in the Josephstädter Theatre. Hummel extemporized in an evidently very inspired style on the Allegretto of the A-major Symphony—the public knew the reason of his appearance; his performance and the way in which it was received formed a most inspiring whole.

Shortly after our second visit, a report was spread about Vienna that the London Philharmonic Society had sent Beethoven a hundred pounds sterling, to help him in his illness. It was added that the surprise had produced such an effect upon the poor great man, that he felt alleviated even bodily. When, on the 20th, we were again standing by his bedside, we gathered, it is true, from what he said, that this mark of attention had gratified him exceedingly, but he was very weak, speaking in a low voice, and in broken sentences. "I shall soon leave, probably, for above," he whispered after our greetings. Such exclamations frequently occurred; between them, however, he spoke of plans and hopes, which were, unfortunately, not destined to be realized. Referring to the noble conduct of the Philharmonic Society, he praised the English, and talked of making a journey to London, as soon as he was better. "I will compose them a grand overture and a grand symphony." Then he said he would pay Mme. Hummel a visit (she had accompanied us), and go and stay at I know not how many places. We never once dreamed of writing down anything for him to read. His eye, which, the last time we had seen him, had been still tolerably animated, was now sunk, and he experienced a difficulty in raising himself from time to time. We could no longer give ourselves up to any delusion—the worst was to be feared.

But wretched indeed was the appearance of the extraordinary man when we again visited him, on the 23rd March—it was destined to be the last time. There he lay, faint and wretched, sometimes giving a low sigh. Not a word now escaped his lips—the sweat stood upon his forehead. It so happened that, on one occasion, he could not find his pocket-handkerchief when he required. Hummel's wife took her tiny bit of delicate cambric, and wiped his face with it several times. Never shall I forget the grateful expression of his sunken eye, as it then looked up to her.

On the 26th March, while we were stopping in the art-loving house of Herr von Liebenberg (formerly a pupil of Hummel's), with a joyous party, we were surprised between five and six o'clock by a violent thunderstorm. There was a thick drizzling fall of snow, accompanied by loud claps of thunder and vivid flashes of lightning, which completely illumined the apartment. A few hours later some guests arrived with the intelligence that Ludwig van Beethoven was no more—he had expired at a quarter to six. The peculiar coincidence of the natural phenomenon with the death of so great a man would, assuredly, in heathen times, or in times more devout than the present, not have been looked upon as merely accidental.

The funeral took place on Thursday, the 29th March. The friends invited met at the residence of the Deceased, Schwarzschaner-Haus, No. 230, on the Glacis, outside the Schottenthor. The procession set out from there at three o'clock and proceeded to the church of the Trinity. Eight Capellmeister (marshalls of art, unstained with blood), Eybler, Hummel, Seifried, Kreutzer, Weigl, Gyrowetz, Würfel, and Günsbacher, held the corners of the pall. The coffin was decked with garlands—but no orders lay upon it—Beethoven had never had one. A great number of musicians carrying tapers surrounded the coffin (I can still see Lablache's immense form among them). The procession was endless; the masses of people moving along were to be counted by thousands—all Vienna seemed to be in the streets. Seifried had fitted a chorus for male voices to something of Beethoven's for trombones—the effect was most touching and impressive. I could not penetrate inside the church, but drove off with Hummel to the Währinger churchyard, that was, as it were, completely studded with human beings. We took up our position at the grave, and their awaited the arrival of the hearse. Up to the last moment it was undecided whether or no Anschütz, the celebrated actor, should deliver an oration written by Grillparzer—but it ended by Anschütz delivering it outside the entrance to the churchyard, so that we lost this portion of the ceremony. After a somewhat considerable interval, the procession approached. The coffin was lowered into the ground—Hummel, profoundly moved, threw some laurel-wreaths upon it—others followed his example. There was, as far as I can remember, neither any further speaking nor singing, but every one appeared to feel deeply the solemnity of the moment, and a sentiment of profound respect and sorrow sighed, as it were, through the whole of the immense mass of the people.

There are not probably many now alive who were present at that regal burial in the full consciousness of the grandeur of the man whom the earth covered. But, since then, millions have grown up in whose intellectual life Beethoven occupies a place which no one else and nothing else could fill. It is not till its outer covering has turned to dust that true genius stands out in all its perfection, and that endless love surrounds him who has himself no love more to bestow.

Marx's Characterisation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

BY A. E. KROEGER.

To comprehend a work of art like this, one has to know all its divisions and their relations to each other. As we have already seen, the fundamental division of the Ninth Symphony is into two parts, the second to which is Schiller's "Hymn to Joy," with an introduction recapitulating all the chief themes of the First Part. This First Part comprises in itself three movements: an Allegro, a Scherzo, and an Adagio.

Now the most important and distinctive portion of a Symphony (as well as of a Sonata, a Quartet, &c.), as it regards form and internal structure, is the first movement,—commonly Allegro, or some quick tempo. The key to the whole work must be found there. Therefore, to aid the student in the understanding of the Symphony in question, we append (from Marx) the following analysis, or skeleton, of the usual structure of the first movement of a Symphony, a Sonata, violin Quartet, &c. It is simply the formula to which, with more or less modification, all so called classical Sonata movements will be found to conform.

The divisions are numbered and lettered for easier comparison with the observations of Marx. And in our translation of the latter, the number of the measures has been given for the convenience of those who are able to obtain a piano arrangement of the work, and thus to study it out minutely.

The First Movement of a Sonata, or a Symphony, resolves itself into three divisions, as follows:

- I.
- a. Introduction.
- b. Chief Theme in Chief Key.
- c. Transition. (Generally, in Symphonies, &c., modulated into the dominant if the piece is in major, into the small upper third if the piece is in minor.)
- d. Chant. (Generally, in Symphonies, &c., in the Dominant if the piece is in major, in the small upper third if in minor.)
- e. Final Theme. (Generally, in Symphonies, &c., in Dominant or upper third as above.)

II.

Middle Group. Connecting Part I. with Part III.; taking all its themes from Part I., but elaborating them ad libitum, in divers keys, &c.

III.

Repetition of Part I. in a varied way and (generally) with an Appendix, giving additional energy or a new variation to the chief theme.

And now it is Marx himself who speaks, and gives us his analysis of the Ninth Symphony.

And so once more, and for his last Symphony, the master called together his army of instruments; once more to show us a world of souled and active beings proceeding from the element of sound; beings that sing the everlasting battle and mourning song, which is called life, and that find the only consolation of life in the command: to love each other, like the little children of Saint John.

FIRST PART: FIRST MOVEMENT.

a. In the undetermined—the Quint—the second violins and the violoncellos, swelled by the low breath of the horns, begin to sound trembling tones, from the pregnant night whereof lightning-flashes of a new birth dash down into the depth, (1st to 17th measure). b. In a slow* anxious way there then arises a powerful, sinister form (17th to 22nd measure); a creation rather of the commanding will than of the hearts' emotion. For the will announces itself in the rhythm; and there it fixes this unchangeable sinister D—F—A, telling it to strike now, to dash down now, to stand and root itself firmly now.

This internal formation of the chief Theme, so very simple in its conception,—and yet in its development of so irresistible a will-power,—is of the highest significance for the whole composition; and precludes all supposition that the meaning of the Symphony might have a connection with the meaning of Schiller's Ode. The Symphony has solitarily entered the dark path of its course in this solitary, powerful harmony of its instruments. c. The subdominant is now introduced (22nd to 26th measure)—again with the impress of most self-determining will—to fix this chief theme still more permanently, that now, amidst the sound of trumpets and horns, proclaims its existence of woe to the wide world, and then with stubborn defiance plunges back into the night, (34th measure). This defiant stubbornness, which yet cannot keep from twice crying out its woe, this staying on the dubious quart sixth chord, that wrenches itself into the fundamental chord with contemptuous disregard of the mediating dominant, this lawless and loose down-plunging of the violins: all suggests titanic formation and a wizard power.

And is not Beethoven the wizard creator and master in this world of instruments, which now listens to his command for the last time?

Once more, and this time planted more firmly upon the tonic, the depth trembles as at first in the Introduction, and the quickly vanishing sounds of the violins and basses dash down in the same way, and grope anxiously and restlessly around amongst second fiddles and violas; and then there again arises that grand tone formation of the chief theme from the darkness of the night; but this time in the more secure and luminous key of B-flat major; soon, however, turning back into the melancholy of D minor. This is accomplished in a very energetic manner by the energetic rhythm as well as by the opposition of the instruments: all the brass instruments being opposed to the string instruments. Then the whole, closely following the theme in sixteenths, gets into a pushing movement, from which there arises an elegiac chant of the first violin, which the viola and basses repeat, the fagott accompanying in octaves, and which in the next measure the flutes, oboes and clarionettes take up in double octaves.

In a quick, decisive transition the dominant of B major is taken hold of and kept, amidst the chanting of the elegiac song, by the fagotts, clarionets and flutes, alternating with that of the same song by the oboes and horns, until the second part of the chant enters (80th measure) which is again an alternate song of clarinet and fagott opposed to flute and oboe, supported by the bass viols. From here the voices,—scarcely for a moment arrested by a couple of energetic beats,—float into B major (108th measure), return to B flat, waft themselves from sixteenths into the double-quick movement of thirty-seconds, and finally elaborate the chant into the final theme from the firm germ of the chief theme; but this time it sounds boldly and strongly in B flat major (150th measure); and yet that Elegy to which the instruments have been surrendered until now checks even this bold conclusion in producing any real joyful effect. So also in this conclusion the separation of the instruments is kept up; the violins are in advance; the orchestra follows; and it is not till in the fourth beat (153d measure) that the mighty unison-theme is also rhythmically brought to perfect unity. One step from B flat to A and we are again at the beginning, which was the Introduction to I.

But it is here not simply a repetition of that I.; it is now the introduction of II. of the first movement of the Symphony. The A minor chord changes into the sixth chord (F sharp—d—a,) which again turns into the chord of the subdominant, G minor, which with its peculiarly soft and plaintive character has not the gloomy effect that the chief key, D minor, had in I. Both modulations occur again in the middle of the measure; and this premature pushing ahead, which we meet so often in the first movement, this stepping upon the secondary instead of the primary rhythm of the measure, is significant of the elegiac character, that rules throughout the whole first movement.

The chief theme now expands itself in G minor (179th to 189th measure). The horns, flutes, clarionets and oboes sound their long note, whilst the second violin and violoncello tremble forth their tremolo; the first violin and the viola meanwhile move in advance, followed first by the fagott, then by the flute, and finally by the oboe and clarinet together, the bass viol intermingling lowly. This chief theme is again (189th measure) followed by the final theme of I., but this time in the woeful chord of C—F sharp—A—E flat, and dragging along a new elegiac chant, taken from the sixteenth-motive of the sombre but energetic chief theme. Both themes interchange again and expand in all directions; the plaintive theme passing from the bass viols to the first violin, second violin, horn and brass instruments. It is absolutely impossible to develop the progress and change (to the 298th measure) of this sad and yet forcible, often tender and then again excited play of tones, that grope around as if they had lost their way. Moreover the decision is at hand.

III.

This decision is nothing else than that same first call and dash of lightning of the Introduction to I., which comes in now as the beginning of III, that is to say as the return of I., just as it also constituted the fundamental motive of II., to which it furnished indeed its chief theme and its final theme. Now the ruling power of this thought is decided! It announces itself (303d to 315th measure) in the highest power of all the violins and violas of the orchestra, and rings out amongst the long-breathed cry of all the wind instruments as well as amongst the incessant knocking of the trumpets and the tremendous trembling of the bass viols (extending through three octaves); immovably holding itself, like a phantom of terror, or the sombre flaming earth-spirit before Faust, who had conjured it up and could not support its view—upon F sharp—A—D; until in the twelfth beat (312th measure) it turns into E flat major, and three beats further finally into the chief key, D minor, therein to complete itself in the form of the chief theme. To complete itself? Ah no! The dreary giant-spirit does not yet allow completion. Even that very first chord (F sharp—A—D) cannot be well conceived—in the sense of the whole movement of the present moment—as purely a D-major chord; it rather suggests (as if we heard D—F sharp—A—C) G minor, the subdominant; which now returns (D—F—A changing into C—D—F sharp—A) amidst the departing roar of the storm, until after 16 measures a friendly strip of blue sky looks down through the thunder clouds. It was the chant which passed by, quiet but full of comfort, without endeavoring to hide the accents of its melancholy.

Thus the first movement of the Ninth Symphony passes away. We dare not follow the all-powerful and over-rich development into its details; we must not even try to gather together all the connecting signs, that attest our conception of the work. Richer, though gloomier, than any other movement of Beethoven's previous works, does this movement roll along its mighty waves, like the sombre stream of Hades. And where Beethoven generally loved to develop his mightiest, gladiest power—in the appendix—he here completes his dreary giant picture, causing it to arise in its weird power still more formidable than before.

For after the imperative final theme (419th to 426th measure) the modulation stays quiet on the last harmony, takes up the first violin, accompanied far down by the shadow-like fagott, and sounds once more the first theme of the movement; and now for the first time undeniably unfolds the sorrowful heart that beats in this mighty breast (426th to 431st measure) and that can find no end to its grand complaint, the flute intermingling its innocence breathing tones with phantasy-like freedom. Once more the instruments start, as in I., their mixed chants; once more the theme, made out of a combination of the 3d and 4th measure of the chief theme, is heard; but this time in the far-off resounding, comforting tones of the first horn, to which the second horn forms the dark background (469th measure). Then we hear here in D major, in a natural healthy voice, and in pleasant cheerful tones, what at first in the bass and in G minor sounded gloomily and plaintively, as if it never could rise to cheerfulness. True, here also it soon returns to the gloom of D minor with the sombre piano intonation of the violins and the bass viols; finally the movement leads again to the concluding theme.

But here there arises as the final assurance a new picture, which seems to spring from the region of shadows. Violas, violoncellos, bass viols and fagotts commence very lowly (the first named in a tremolo) a weird movement (513th measure); the second violins and first violins join it gradually and keep up the tremolo, and amidst the agony-cry of the wind-instruments, the deep current with thrilling restlessness rolls along its gloomy bed, and spreads itself out over all the octaves, and swells from its secrecy into the force of thunder, and gropes around with outstretched arms, and sounds like the cry for help of the alarm-bells.

This life of the instrumental tone beings hides sombre mysteries in its heart. What must have their creator have experienced in his fated life of seclusion, and what must he have hidden in the eternal dumbness of his breast! Having for the riddle of his own internal life nothing but the riddle language of tones,—one mystery for the solution of another one! But he stood unbent, though deeply moved. How powerful and firmly fixed he stood is testified amongst other things by this perfect freedom of the instruments, each of which seems to exist only for itself, whilst he guides them all with firm rein along his road, and by the perfect and clear form given to these thoughts of wonderful depth and wealth. If our modern form-worshippers would but allow themselves to be taught, instead of confusing themselves and those who confide in them, this last and great work would furnish them the safest anchor.

The first movement of every Symphony is decisive as to the thought of the whole work; it is particularly so decisive in the Ninth. And what has it uttered? The endless complaint of everlasting dissatisfaction, which accompanies in his own realm of the world of instruments Him, who filled and invigorated it with his mighty soul! Even though those voices of the instruments charm all nature together, even though they whisper into our ears sweet spirit tones, or sweep down from heaven like the greeting of angels to men: still man always needs, above all, Man; and the voice of man is to man the most dear, most deeply felt, most comprehensible music. This is universal truth; and this truth arose to the consciousness of Beethoven in the world of instruments that he had so mightily peopled.

Then came the time to separate. And if, mayhap, —as we cannot know—a presentiment of his death touched the noble man, it must have helped to awaken that consciousness and united with it. Was not he solitary in the loud world of man as he was solitary in the world of his instruments and musical visions? And his open, loving, altogether harmless soul so yearned for the dear companionship of man! This sense of brotherhood and love of men,—how it penetrates all his works, his letters, and even shines through his attacks of suspicion, jealousy and injustice!

Thus the external resolve to give to his Symphony a new formation by appending to it a final chorus, became an internal necessity. That which was a general truth and a particular life experience of Beethoven, became now the ruling idea of the Ninth Symphony.

Liszt's Description of Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

Passing over the Abbate's long analysis of the now very familiar Overture, we give what he has said of the opera itself.

The first scene leads us into the mysterious grotto, which, as the tradition tells, was in the Hürselberg. There in a rosy twilight we see nymphs, dryads and bacchantes waving their thyrsus wands and wreaths to the rhythms, which formed the first fifty bars in the Allegro of the Overture. They surround the goddess, luxuriously stretched upon her couch, clad in the Grecian tunic, which flows in rich folds around her form, as if its slight net-work formed a yet rosier vapor than the whole atmosphere around. In the depths of the grotto the tranquil waters of the lake reflect the shadows of the bushes, under which happy couples wander to and fro; there we behold the tempting syrens. At the feet of Dame Venus sits her lover, melancholy and gloomy, listlessly holding his harp in his hand. She asks him the cause of his sadness. He heaves a deep sigh, as if awaking from a dream that had led him away from the surrounding element. Alarmed, she presses her inquiries. "Freedom!" replies the prisoner at last, and suddenly seizing his harp, he begins a song, in which he makes a vow ever to praise her charms, but adds that he is consumed by a yearning for the upper world:

But from these rose-lit od'rous bowers
I yearn for woods and breath of flowers,
For our own sky's clear blue, serene,
For our fresh meadows' pleasant green.
Our little wood-birds cheerful singing,
Our village bells so friendly ringing:—
From thy soft empire I must flee,
O queen, and goddess! set me free!

This song, full of manly energy, gives us again the melody which we have twice indicated in the overture; its words are in praise of Venus. But this strophe is instantly followed by an antistrophe, which, by painful, half-disturbed modulations, escapes from the breast like a piercing scream; the scream of the caged eagle, that would return to the realm of storms and sunshine; the cry of the soul that would wing its way back to heaven. Thrice are strophe and antistrophe repeated, and every time a half tone higher, which lends thrilling climax to their impassioned intonation.

By a single word, but one of those words which suffice to invest Poetry with the fullest majesty of her sister, Truth, Wagner reveals the greatness of a soul unsatisfied in the lap of sweetest inactivity, when Tannhäuser exclaims:

Mortal remain I yet, and human;
Too great thy love, thou more than woman;
If gods forever can enjoy,
My lot is change, my pleasures cloy;
Not joy alone my heart contains,
In pleasures still I long for pains.

To long for pains! Is not that the longing for the Infinite? For what are pains but the sufferings of the soul chafing against the limits of our nature, which it will never renounce striving to overstep?

The offended enchantress starts up, like a wounded tigress, interrupts her prisoner, snatching the harp from his hand, and summoning up a cloud, which parts them from each other, she mocks at the vain remorse of her delirious slave. She reminds him that he is accursed, that he belongs to her through all the powers of everlasting doom, that he must no more think of a world which would repulse him with horror, should he go back. The proud knight does not believe the imperious dame, and replies: "Repentance will remove the ban!" Their mutual resistance is expressed in a duet, full of impetus, of mutually kindled scorn and hatred, which Venus suddenly breaks off, to have recourse to weapons of blandishment. She lets the songs of the syrens resound, which in the distance seem to grow still more languishing and seductive; and inclining herself towards him, she seems to distil the fatal poison drop by drop into his veins,—that impotence of pleasure which twines about his drooping energies with indissoluble chains. Her somewhat lengthy song takes, a semitone lower, that lovely motive for the clarinet, which occurs in the overture. It is accompanied, too, pianissimo, and veiled by the tremolo of the violins. To those who cherish symbolism, this scene may be designated as the description of one of those inward conflicts, which rend the manly breast, during which the soul debates with itself, however divided it may be in its will, unlike in forms, but identical in essence; such would fancy that they heard in it, not different persons, but different expressions of the passions, rebutting one another in a vehement conference, whose fatal or marvellous issue no one could foresee. Tannhäuser forcibly disentwines himself from the arms of the goddess, and in feverish excitement exclaims: "My salvation lies in the holy Maria!" Scarcely has he pronounced this name, when the goddess, the nymphs, the syrens and bacchantes vanish. It all melts away.

Instead of the grotto, we see the outside of the mountain, in whose interior all this is located by tradition, and the rural scenery about the Wartburg. In an instant the knight is transported from the depths, where in the intoxicating mists of sweet perfumes the lamps with their colored sheen illumined a night of pleasures without end, into the freshness of a pure Spring morning. To the bewildered tumult of the last scene succeeds total silence of the orchestra, and the soft, dreamy tune of a shepherd, seated on a neighboring rock; the refrain of his reed pipe, happily imitated by the English horn, creates a beneficial contrast. Presently you hear a chorus of pilgrims in the distance; during the pauses the voice of the shepherd, commending himself to their prayers, forms a new contrast; his pastoral melody winds like a flowering field vine about the stern outlines of the pious hymn, which rises like the arching of a Gothic vault.

The pilgrims approach, appear, and pass before us, and their song, in which the second half of the religious theme of the overture is interwoven, wears a calm and serenely pious character. In this repose there vibrates, however, a certain exaltation and enthusiasm, and you can distinguish in it an enduring ecstasy, a secret uncontrollable delight. They stop before an image of the Madonna; Tannhäuser at their chant falls upon his knees. As much overwhelmed by the miracle of mercy, that has rescued him, as he is surprised to see his bold wish so suddenly heard, his deliverance so unexpectedly fulfilled, he repeats the words of the pilgrims:

Ah, heavy weigh my sins on me,
No longer can I bear the trial;
All rest and comfort now I'll flee,
And choose but pain and self-denial.

The bells of the distant churches summon the faithful to morning prayer, and at the same time hunting-horn signals, from different distances (alternating between F major and E flat minor), complete the impression of this hour of rural repose and woodland solitude. Presently the landgrave with his hunting party comes along, and perceiving a knight who takes no part in the chase, he approaches him and recognizes Tannhäuser. We have already said, that Wolfram von Eschenbach, his rival in minstrelsy as in love for the princess Elizabeth, who loves him, has finally persuaded him, in speaking of her, to resume his old rank among the minstrels, whom he has so often vanquished, and who nevertheless have mourned his absence. The cantilena of a lovely melodic motive, breathing a tender and inward emotion, is resumed again in his first eight measures and dialogized in the andante of a Sextet, composed of the five singers and the landgrave, who entrust Tannhäuser to return to them. At the name of Elizabeth his face lights up as with a quickening beam, and he exclaims:

Again I know thee, ah! and love thee,
O beautiful world, so long withdrawn!
Again the heavens smile sweet above me,
And flowers are fresh with dewy morn.
The Spring with thousand friendly greetings
Like music in my soul doth stir;
In tender and tumultuous beatings
My heart cries out: To her! to her!

As soon as his voice unites with the others, the Septuor sets into a joyful and rapturous Allegro, whose finale, interrupted by the fanfare of the chase, forms the conclusion of the first act. The different voices are grouped in such a masterly manner, and their parts in this ensemble piece are marked with such select and noble fineness, that there is no mistaking therein the calling of the minstrel, the challenge of noble rivals to a noble contest. This finale takes an irresistible hold upon the public, and universal admiration and applause resound through the hall.

Nothing can be more natural, more chaste and piously tender, than the cheerfulness, the joy, so frank and free from jealous feeling, with which Elizabeth receives her knight, whom Wolfram himself leads to her. With lightsome step, and with the happy smile of first youth, which has not yet lost the demeanor of childhood, she hastens into the hall, where she had heard the songs so deeply buried in her heart, and whose threshold, since the disappearance of her minstrel, she had never crossed. With outspread arms, as if she would spread over all surrounding things the clear light of her happiness, the radiance of her sympathizing and high hearted bliss, she trips in, already dressed for the approaching festival, not doubting that her knight and singer will bear off the victory and win her for the prize. A simple rim of gold, more like a halo than a diadem, encircles her blond head; her long tresses fall under a light veil down over the drapery of white satin, whose embroidery marks the picturesque bodice of the female costume of that epoch. A mantle of blue satin fastened on the shoulders seems, like heaven's azure, to float around this vision of embodied innocence.

As if godless,—crowning with roses her dark hair, fastened by a Grecian net over her voluptuously curved neck, and crossing the purple ribands of her sandals over her alabaster feet,—exercising all her might, revealing all the charms concealed under her half closed eyelids, and in her girdle, which now brightly gleams and now vanishes from sight, has presented to the pleasure drunken minstrel Beauty itself, Beauty absolute and incomparable:—so on the other hand the princess Elizabeth must transport his soul by a lofty and surprising beauty, which descends to him as it were from the empyrean heights, to dispute the other, that came up out of the briny waves to the abode of mortals.

The duet between Tannhäuser and Elizabeth might, for feeling and musical beauty, be compared to that between Achilles and Iphigenia by Gluck. The same enthusiasm in the joy of the present, the same chaste abandon, the same simple and full confession of a deep passion, the same renewal of an always varied and yet always identical theme,—a theme, so full of pure and happy love, that one might believe it an echo of celestial bliss, never to be interrupted or disturbed. . . . It ends with an Allegro, in which the loud jubilee of the joy intoxicated soul breaks out, and which breathes an impassioned ecstasy, that rings like a high ho-anna sung to Love.

The minstrel contest, although a little abstract and metaphysical, yet intimately involved in the knot of the drama, is an episode which controls it and whose musical part is treated with a great expenditure of power and thought. It is preceded by a march, during which, with all the ceremonial etiquette of those times, the distinguished guests of the landgrave pass across the stage, to seat themselves according to their rank in seats arranged in semi circles, the centre being reserved for the minstrels. The high barons appear, their mantles embroidered with their coat of arms. The noble ladies, dressed in the colors of their houses, let their trains be borne by pages. The march has a felicitous rhythm, neither too much accented, nor too characterless. It admirably indicates the composed, proud bearing of these noble gentlemen, for whom it is an equal glory to handle the harp or the sword. This march, in B major, is followed by a second in G, marking the entrance of the minstrels; in a more solemn measure, it has a more earnest, elegant and noble character than the first; this is one of those well thought out details, which make Wagner's compositions so rich and full of study.

When the numerous guests have arranged themselves in their places, and the minstrels have appeared one by one, a deep silence ensues. Wolfram is the first who rises, for Elizabeth has drawn his name from the urn. Like the rest, he hears his harp in his hand; this instrument accompanies all their songs, and plays not only in this act, but throughout the whole score, a great part, which requires a skilful artist to execute the complicated passages, which are too prominent to admit of being shortened. Wolfram's recitative is executed in a rich style. It is the song of a contemplative soul, shaken by no inward passion, and prompted by no outward spur. As Tannhäuser prepares to answer him, the orchestra resumes the first notes of that voluptuous molto in the overture, which also formed the rhythm of the hachantes' dance, when he, begging of Venus his "Freedom!" still promised to continue to praise her charms. As if this slight band of a promise, which he flung behind him at parting, were enough to draw him down to perdition, the spectator, the moment he is reminded of it, is seized with an instinctive terror, which increases moment by moment, like the awe preceding a catastrophe. As the strife grows more exciting, and more and more vehement rejoinders and with embittering the guilty knight, the tones become clearer and higher every time that fatal reminiscence strikes the ear, till finally Tannhäuser, desperate and beside himself, takes up entire the strophe of the first act, and sings the same praises of the Goddess of Love, without reservation or disguise.

The amazement, terror and confusion of the tragic situation which now follows, are spontaneously checked by the gestures of Elizabeth, who throws herself between him and danger. She espouses and defends in the most touching manner the cause of her faithless knight. She does not hide the tears which swell her breast. Presently her voice dies out in long-drawn tones, as if her physical powers had forsaken her in this painful task; presently her spiritual strength re-animates her, and, with more and more touching and penetrating tones, she calls heaven and earth to witness that obstinacy here were sacrilege; she is inspired to disarm their wild fury and commands them, in the name of the Saviour himself, to refrain from hasty condemnation. At the first answer, which Tannhäuser had made to Wolfram, she had felt her heart beat with passionate sympathy; in confession of this, she had given him a sign, which he however had not noticed, since in all other quarters he had found no favor; she knew that, even if sin had seduced the bride-groom of her soul, it must have been through treachery, for she neither doubted of his inborn high heartedness, nor of the means of his salvation. When they have sheathed their swords, Tannhäuser's bold bearing yields to helpless exhaustion, and he sinks down at her feet. Elizabeth concludes her prayer of highest love and sorrow with an exhausted, dying voice. Filled with wonder and amazement, all exclaim: "An angel came down from the etherial light, to announce to us God's holy counsel!" and these words are conveyed by a melody which, cheerfully and mildly, rises and floats through several measures, during which this angelic being seems to become visible to our eyes. The compassionate, persuasive song of her, who has succeeded in inspiring gentleness in the infuriated souls of the rude knights, is very long, and written in a manner which cannot be better characterized than by saying that it approximates to the church style. In it appears that extraordinary rhythm, which in the following ensemble pieces (when the by-standers, smitten by this sublime interposition, dare not resist so heavenly a manifestation of love), seems to return the beating of those agitated, inspired, awe-stricken hearts. This grand finale repeats also the principal theme of the aria of the princess and ends with a resumption of the melody: "An angel came down," &c. Wagner has seen fit here to carry the melodic development of this chaos to the extreme limits of musical effect. Composed merely of men's voices, borne along by a single soprano, like a silver censer, whence ascend dark clouds of smoky incense, this chorus expresses a deep felt earnestness and spreads abroad that pious, devout feeling, which one is only wont to find in holy temples. The act closes with Tannhäuser's call to repentance. He joins the pilgrims, who are just then passing by the castle, and repeating the first fragment of their morning song, upon their way to Rome.

Beethoven's Centenary in Dresden.

BY PROFESSOR E. P. EVANS.

[From the Independent.]

Although the public mind is now chiefly occupied with military and political events, the Germans do not forget those heroes of art, whose achievements have done more than all the triumphs of diplomatists and field-marshal's to render the name of their fatherland illustrious. A cheering evidence of this fact is furnished by the enthusiasm with which the recent centennial anniversary of Beethoven's birth has been celebrated throughout all Germany, from the Baltic to the Alps.

Here, in Dresden, the so called "Florence of the Elbe," justly famous for its love of music and the fine arts, four days were devoted to the celebration. The first festival was held on the evening of the 16th, in the new and beautiful hall of the Trades Union, which was adorned for the occasion with a colossal statue of the great composer by Professor Schilling. The programme opened with the magnificent march and chorus from the "Ruins of Athens," followed by a poem written by Adolf Stern, and recited in an admirable manner by Fräulein Langenhahn, of the Royal Theatre. Then came Beethoven's overture "Zur Namensfeier," succeeded by a well-written and well-delivered address by Dr. Julius Pahst, and an unusually fine performance of the Ninth Symphony, with concluding chorus, which is in many respects the grandest of Beethoven's creations. After the concert was ended, the banquet began, and continued till after four o'clock in the morning, the substantial repast being enlivened by music and poetry and the customary pyrotechnics of post prandial eloquence. On the evening of the 17th there was a celebration in the Royal Theatre, of which the first part consisted of an allegorical drama entitled "The Awakening of the Arts," and written for the occasion by Julius Rodenberg. In the opening scene the arts of poetry, architecture, sculpture, history, dancing, painting, and music (personified by actresses in appropriate costumes and with characteristic emblems) were seen reposing in sleep on banks of cloud, having fled from the earth in consequence of the tumults and terrors of war. Suddenly the voices of an invisible choir were heard ascending from the earth, and calling on the fair sisters to return and gladden the world with their presence. Gradually the arts awoke, and a discussion ensued as to the propriety of heeding the call and descending to dwell again among men. Painting declares that she loves to dip her pencil in the wonders of creation, the glow of the morning or the colors of the sea, but not in blood; Architecture laments the facility of her toil, since her most beautiful and costly structures are destroyed by the hand of war; Poetry doubts whether a people in the splendor of its victories has any sense left for art; Sculpture despairs as she sees her finest images and most divine forms broken in pieces; Historians find in these earnest days no place for her double mask of tragedy and comedy; Dancing, the expression and embodiment of joy, dares not enter, with tambourine and "light fantastic toe," the arena of international strife, which is trodden only by the iron feet of soldiery; Music alone is not despondent, but answers the complaints of her sisters with cheerful and prophetic words. A people, she says, to whom freedom is dear will also cherish art as a sacred possession.

Not for fame or conquest, but for fatherland, they seized the sword and sang a "song of home" as they marched to victory. Poetry will receive new inspiration from their heroic deeds; for, without Achilles and his army, where would have been Homer and the Iliad? Architecture will teach how to erect a temple of peace with grander columns and stronger arches than heretofore—a new Parthenon, new Propylæa; under the plastic hand of Sculpture new forms of heroism will step forth from blocks of marble; Histrionics will show the events of history in their eternal connection, and represent them in transfigured light for the instruction of future generations; Painting will portray them in living colors on the canvas; and even the jocund Dance will feel incited to join and lead the festive throng. Music then calls upon her sisters to descend with her to the earth, where a great nation seems to forget the calamities and bitter stress of war, in its eagerness to do homage to the master who brought to them from Heaven the highest revelations of harmony and symphony. As the sisters vanish behind the clouds, a beautiful rainbow spans the sky—a symbol of the perfect unity in diversity of the seven arts, and at the same time a herald of their peaceful reign. The third scene was on the earth, and represented a public place, with a temple in the background. In the foreground were two altars, which the people were adorning with flowers and strewing with incense, as they sang the well-known chorus from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens"—"Schmueckt die Altäre!"

But the most remarkable feature of the whole drama was the procession of the artists, who descended the steps of the temple and occupied seats on each side of the stage. First came the representatives of Poetry—Goethe, Schiller, Lessing, Wolfram von Eschenbach, Dante, and Shakespeare. These were followed by the composers—Mozart, Weber, Haydn, Bach, Gluck and Handel; the actors—Eckhof, Iffland, Devrient, Garrick; the architects—Erwin von Steinbach (with a model of the Strasbourg Cathedral), Schinkel, and Palladio; the painters—Raphael, Dürer, Rubens, Michael Angelo, Leonardo da Vinci, and Rembrandt; the sculptors—Thorwaldsen, Rauch, and Peter Vischer. These illustrious dead were personated in the most perfect manner by actors, dressed in appropriate costume and with a strikingly faithful "presentment" of the faces of the deceased. Goethe, Schiller, Lessing, Shakespeare, Dante, Bach, Garrick, Raphael, Dürer, Rubens, Michael Angelo, and Rembrandt were easily recognizable as they appeared on the stage. Particularly fine was the aria with chorus, in which the hope was expressed that this festival might be prophetic of the people's future, and a revival of the fatherland bring with it a revival of the arts. In the fifth scene the seven arts reappeared on the earth, and a flash of lightning kindled the two altars, on the front of which were the words Freedom and Beauty in letters of fire. The drama closed with the chorus "G r m a n i a ! Germania!", after which there was a representation of what Dr. Pabst calls "the queen of the operas," Beethoven's Fidelio. Those who are acquainted with the singers of Germany will have a sufficient guaranty that it was excellently performed in the fact that Rocco and Florestan were sung by Scaria and Von Witt, and Fidelio and Marcelline by Mme. Kainz Prause and Mme. Otto-Alvsleben. On the evening of the 18th Goethe's Egmont was given, with the music of Beethoven's Egmont; and on the evening of the 19th there was a repetition of Rodenbergs Allegorical Drama, followed by a concert of selections from Beethoven—among them the Aria "Ah Ferido," sung by Fräulein Zimmermann, with the clear and pure tones for which her voice is remarkable.

"Beethoven is Germany" says Victor Hugo. Of all the arts, however, music is the most cosmopolitan; and of all composers, Beethoven is the most difficult to confine within geographical or national boundaries. Since his death, forty-three years ago, he has constantly increased in popularity—not only in Germany, but throughout the civilized world; so that it may be safely asserted that his works are now performed more than those of all the other classical composers put together. In the symphony, which is the most comprehensive form of pure instrumental music, he stands unrivaled and unequalled. Compared with these free and bold creations, the productions of Haydn and Mozart are timid and feeble. In them the great master revealed himself as in no other of his works. His deafness deepened and intensified the peculiar character of these compositions, as is clearly seen in the Ninth Symphony. As the blind prophet discerned the future without his vision being disturbed by any fleeting phenomena of the present, so the deaf musician listened to soul entrancing harmonies from within, unbroken by the fret and stir of common life around him.

The History of Music.

SIXTH LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

[Reported for the Daily Advertiser, Jan. 14.]

In his lecture last Saturday, Mr. Paine began with a description of the notation of the middle ages, and proceeded from that to the tonal methods then employed. In discussing these he remarked that, although they afforded, by their greater number and complexity, more variety in composition, yet the music, compared to that of later times and the present, was stiff and objective rather than sympathetic and subjective. From these topics he passed to the history of musical instruments, selecting the organ as the first, because, when all others were left to amateurs and the dilettanti, this was used by the great masters. Describing the first organ, he said it contained but one row of pipes, and had keys a foot long and three or four inches wide, which were struck with the elbows and fists. He gave short sketches of the first organists, Italian and German, and by way of illustration performed on the piano two of the ancient compositions. He described in an interesting way the lesser musical instruments of the middle ages, tracing their changes and modifications into their present forms. The lute he considered as in some sort a progenitor of the piano, having been the instrument of amateurs and households in the olden days. Speaking of the difficulty of keeping lutes in tune, he quoted a remark that if a person kept a lute eighty years he would have occupied sixty of them in tuning his instrument. He added that it was said that to keep a lute in Paris costs as much as to keep a horse. He mentioned several instruments which had become nearly or quite obsolete, one of them being a kind of bassoon with a mouth piece inserted in a bag, which, being inflated with wind, caused the instrument to produce what Prætorius described as a cackling sound. In the course of his lecture he introduced the fact that Bach first taught the use of the thumbs in fingering, only three fingers having been employed previously, while the thumbs were regarded as incumbrances. Having concluded his lecture, Mr. Paine treated the audience to a performance of Dr. Bull's "King's Hunting Jig."

SEVENTH LECTURE, JAN. 21.

Mr. Paine's subject on Saturday last was the origin and early progress of dramatic music, beginning with the religious dramas of the early church and ending with the establishment in a crude form of opera and oratorio. Having remarked that the epic form preceded the dramatic in music as well as in poetry, and that the Christian church, after setting its face against the theatre, finally gave it not only countenance but encouragement, Mr. Paine proceeded to give the history of the plays and dramas which subsequently developed themselves into opera and oratorio. The miracle plays, or as they were subsequently vaguely called, mysteries, were in vogue quite early, and before the tenth century they were popular and exercised a powerful effect on the people. These plays were originally performed wholly by ecclesiastics. Afterwards laymen were allowed to take part, and at a later period the participation of priests was forbidden.

Strolling musicians became the performers, and the subjects and the manner of treatment became not only secular but vulgar. The plays, even when sacred, had gradually increased in length until they occupied several days in the performance. The movable stage was divided into three parts. Above was the celestial choir; below, on the second stage, was the congregation of saints, and the remainder of the singers occupied the lowest stage. At one side was the mouth of a cavern, from which issued the most frightful howls, supposed to represent the agonies of the damned. The jesters and buffoons were assigned this task of howling, and they issued from the mouth of the cavern to assume the comic parts of the drama. In England these mysteries were performed and the whole drama of the universe was represented from the creation to the day of judgment. The several guilds had different subjects assigned to them,—to the dyers the deluge, to the tanners the creation, to another the fall of Lucifer, and so on. Only one of these mystery plays has remained to the present time,—performed once in ten years at Ober-Ammergau in the Bavarian Tyrol. It was performed last year, but not as usual through the entire season, owing to the interruption caused by the war.

There was another class of plays set to music, of which the "Robbin and Marion" of Adam de la Halle was an example. A specimen from this work was given in the second lecture. In the passion plays there was nothing spoken. The story and the dialogues were intoned, and the words of the people sung by a chorus. It was a common custom to give the words of the several characters in part harmony. Mr. Paine gave a singular description of an entertainment provided on the occasion of the marriage of the Duke Sforza with Isabella of Arragon in the fourteenth century, and of the masks, which were long a popular class of dramatic entertainments, into which music was introduced. In all these performances solo singing was unknown, even up to the sixteenth century. All the speeches of single characters were sung in the form of madrigals by persons behind the scenes. There was a curious play of this period wherein a servant accidentally pulls the spigot out of a wine-cask and lets the liquor out. The master and servants grope on the floor, berating each other in five part harmony until the unlucky spigot is found. It was toward the middle of the sixteenth century that a composer conceived the idea of giving the highest part of a madrigal to be sung by a single voice and the other parts to be performed on instruments. But this was not like the aria system of the present day. The melody had no beauty of its own disjoined from the accompaniment.

The invention of the opera and the oratorio, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, Mr. Paine conceived to mark the second of three great ages in the development of music,—the first being the reformation of church music in the middle ages and the third the improvement of instrumental music in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Mr. Paine gave a sketch of the origin of the opera in the effort of Florentine musicians, who met at the house of Bardi, to revive the ancient Greek tragedies; and of the oratorio in the church concerts. A specimen of each was given,—a recitative from one of the earlier operas by Peri, composed for the marriage of Henry IV. of France, and another from an opera or oratorio of the "Soul and Body," both interesting as illustrating the progress which solo singers had attained in that age. Although we speak of these specimens of dramatic music as recitative, they differ widely from the recitatives of our day, being about midway between that class of music and the aria. Mr. Rudolphsen sang both selections finely. The early operas were attempts to revive Greek tragedies, but they must have differed widely from those dramas. The effort, however, resulted in the introduction of a new element in musical development, which afterwards grew and improved very rapidly.

EIGHTH LECTURE, JAN. 28.

One of the most interesting thus far. The general subject was the second period of the Opera, and the manner in which, under various influences, it emerged from the crude and imperfect form in which it first appeared, from the hands of Galilei, Caccini and their contemporaries, to a more artistic and pleasing and popular form. The vocal illustrations of several successive composers were given with the admirable assistance of Mrs. Barry, and were sufficiently numerous to indicate the very substantial and rapid progress made in a very short time.

Mr. Paine gave a description of the opera of "Berenice," performed at Padua on a great occasion toward the end of the sixteenth century, introducing choruses of one hundred virgins, one hundred horsemen, and several others of equal numbers accompanied by one hundred musicians on horse-back. Two elephants and two lions were also brought upon the stage, and the whole scene was one with which no spectacular play of modern times can compare. The first performance of an opera as a public exhibition for the people was at Venice, and before the close of the sixteenth century three hundred and fifty-seven operas by forty different composers had been performed, but it was not until later that the name of opera was given to these works. Monteverde, who was a native of Cremona and was born in 1568, was one of the greatest musicians of his time. He was an innovator in the introduction of discords. Indeed, there is hardly a dissonant interval in use in modern music which he did not employ. There was a great deal of contempt exhibited at the time of Monteverde's "music of the future." His most valuable improvements were in the increased efficiency given to the orchestra and in the introduction of the true arioso style. The orchestra he caused to give very much more dramatic intensity to the accompaniments. He also was the first to preface the opera with an instrumental overture, which he called a tocatta. One of these tocattas it was prescribed, was to be played through three times before the rise of the curtain. He was also the first to use the tremolo effect on the stringed instruments, a practice which was very much derided at first, but which has steadily held its place and has come to be regarded as a perfectly legitimate effect. An interesting selection from Monteverde's opera of "Ariadne" was sung by Mrs. Barry. A brief sketch of Cavalli followed, and a Siciliano of his composition was sung, and was received with evident pleasure by the listeners.

Carissimi, who flourished during the middle and toward the close of the seventeenth century, dying in 1669, was the originator of the chamber cantata—a composition resembling the opera in form, but performed without scenery, and the modern oratorio, except that its subject was always secular. He also greatly improved the recitative and air, and exerted on the progress of music a much greater influence than is usually allowed him. He wrote many oratorios and masses. As a singer he was very eminent and vastly improved the vocalisation of his period. Chamber cantatas moulded the popular taste for music and exerted nearly as much influence in determining its form as madrigals had done a century earlier. Solo singing became very much in vogue, and the beautiful as distinguished from the elevated style began to prevail in Italy. Mr. Paine's remarks on Carissimi were followed by a selection from that composer's cantata on the death of Mary, Queen of Scots,—a most beautiful composition, full of melody and containing many suggestions of the modern Italian aria. Mr. Paine called attention to the stiffness and lack of motion in the accompaniment, to which attention was not paid very generally until somewhat later.

Stradella was one of the most prolific composers of this age, and, so far as his works have been preserved, the best. A story is related that he was to have been murdered by hired assassins, and the time chosen was at the performance of one of his oratorios. The assassins were, however, so much impressed by the excellence of the music and the raptures of the listeners that they relented and would not take the life of a man who contributed so much to the pleasure of the world. Stradella's prayer is a very well known composition, but it bears internal evidence of having been composed at a later period.

Germany was a willing learner in musical art from Italy. With one or two exceptions every known form of modern music had its origin in Italy. Germany had the not less honor of enlarging and ennobling each form as it appeared. The most noted of German composers of the 17th century was Schütz, who died in 1672. He was educated in Venice, but in carrying to Germany the Italian forms he did not forget his nationality. His compositions have a distinct German style. He was the first to introduce the opera in Germany. Besides being thoroughly educated in all branches of learning he was much esteemed for his sterling qualities as a man. He wrote music for the Passion as described by the four evangelists, and gave to the modern sacred cantata its style. Mr. Paine described the cantata of the "Conversion of St. Paul" by Schütz, showing that very striking dramatic effects could be produced by the use of music alone. Mr. Paine spoke of Schütz as the direct forerunner of Bach and Handel.

Contemporaneous with Schütz in Germany there arose a great master of music in Italy,—Scarlatti,—who died in 1756. Most of his compositions have been lost, for reasons which the lecturer subsequently explained. But he was a most prolific composer, for besides numerous other productions he is said to have written one-hundred operas, five hundred cantatas and two hundred masses. The glory of the Italian opera begins with Scarlatti. He exerted great influence on the dramatic character of the art of singing, added greatly to the refinement and expression of the accompaniment and introduced the overture with marked effect. The reign of melody was fairly inaugurated under him. To illustrate his style, Mrs. Barry sang two selections from one of his cantatas. Mr. Paine called attention to the fact that in the first, a recitative, there was a great likeness to the form afterwards so largely used by Bach, and that the air which followed was much similar to the later compositions of Handel, who was a close student of Scarlatti's works. The two selections were very pleasing and instructive. Mr. Paine closed his lecture with a description of an opera of the early days, where the machinist was of more consequence than either the author of the play or the composer of the music. The opera in question had its scene laid in the infernal regions, and from the description given must have been both fearful and grotesque.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The concert of Thursday, Jan. 26, came in the midst of a violent snow-storm; yet the Music Hall, inside, wore as genial an aspect as ever, with hardly a perceptible thinning out of the large and constant audience that has become identified with these occasions. The orchestra were in full force (13 first violins, 10 second, 8 violas, 7 cellos, 7 basses), and did their best (which is now much of the time very good indeed) in the performance of the following programme:

*Vorspiel to "Lohengrin".....R. Wagner.
Aria: "Erbarne dich" ("O pardon me, my God"), from the St. Matthew Passion Music. (Orchestral accompaniment completed by Robert Franz.....J. S. Bach.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.

The Violin Solo by B. Lletemann.

**Pianoforte Concerto, No. 8, in G minor, Op. 58.

Moscheles.
(Born 1794; died, March 10, 1870.)
J. C. D. Parker.

Third Symphony ("Scotch"), in A minor, op. 56.
Mendelssohn.

*Songs:

- "Rose, Meer und Sonne." [From Rückert's "Liebesfrühling."] Op. 37, No. 9.....Schumann.
- "Verdi Prati," from the Opera "Aleinu".....Handel.
- "In the Spring" Op. 23, No. 3.....Franz.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.

Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini.

Haydn, Mozart, BEETHOVEN, Schubert, Mendelssohn—so far had we got in the succession of great Symphonists before and after Beethoven (to whose memory the whole series of ten concerts is dedicated by placing a Symphony of his—in fact a whole Beethoven programme almost—in the first and last concerts also, making him the alpha and omega of the series). This week Schumann came, as next in order of succession, and next time comes Gade. Mendelssohn furnishing the central feature, this whole programme was in a measure fitly toned to him; at least, with the exception of the opening and concluding overtures.

The "Scotch Symphony," his greatest orchestral work, has in it much that is brilliant, jubilant and sunshiny, as well as much that is wild and grand and mystical as on the shore of the great deep. It is extremely picturesque throughout. Nor does it confine itself to impressions of nature; it catches also here and there the humor of Scotch life, as in the little mocking cadence in the second movement; and it goes off with a rollicking sort of "We won't go home till morning" chorus in the brief Finale in the major. And yet to us the dominant impression always after an elaborate work of Mendelssohn is sad, contemplative, akin to gentle, passive reverie. A Symphony by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, or by father Haydn, sets a very different tone. With Mendelssohn, the Aria by Bach and the Concerto by Moscheles helped to complete a picture in a certain delicate, subdued, gentle tone of color. But it is indeed a noble Symphony, full of invention, of beautiful ideas, showing a mastery control of all the orchestral resources, and developing with perfect unity to the end. There are many times when, perfect as we know such a work to be, we are not in the mood to enter into it. But this time it truly spoke to us with power, and brought renewed assurance that Mendelssohn also is great, if in a way of his own which possibly is not the greatest. In the rendering of the whole work Mr. ZERRAHN's orchestra seemed all alive and careful and particularly happy.

—But, to take things in their order,—the short prelude to "Lohengrin," which, as we have said before, is just a piece of broad musical perspective, a sort of atmospheric picture without break or visible step taken anywhere, tones growing out of tones as forms and colors in "dissolving views," was rendered with a purity and delicacy, and a finely graduated crescendo, which must have given an impression of beauty as well as of mystery, to those who have found it wild and uncouth before. To understand it fully, one of course must know Wagner's opera; and then he will know why it begins with the aerial, white tones of the violins thrilling at a height where it is so difficult to keep them true and even; and why the other instruments with cool, gradually deeper, larger tones steal in so imperceptibly, and the whole keeps broadening and greatening until, with the startling, sublime fortissimo of the whole orchestra, you feel that the mystery at first so distantly desecrated, far over the water, is now close upon you (the arrival of Lohengrin in the boat drawn by swans); and then, with brief suggestion of the tragic complication his arrival causes, the withdrawal in the same miraculous manner, and the picture finishing as it began with the thrilling pianissimo in alt. There certainly is poetry in the conception, and we think Wagner has made it palpable in tones. Such a breath of "future" music, while it ministered to the demand of curiosity, was not in violent contrast to or out of keeping with what followed.

had been sung twice before by Mrs. BARRY in former series of these concerts. Yet no one knows it too well; very few well enough to feel themselves familiar with or half appreciative of its beauty, and its deep, tender, quiet and unspeakably religious feeling. In fact the charm of such melody, inwrought and intertwined with such accompaniment, is inexhaustible. We but begin to know it when we hear it once. Of course it is not popular music; it is not brilliant, startling, sensuous, or catching. But it is profoundly edifying, and its beauty is of the kind that is eternal; the deeper one's experience in life, the more one knows of sorrow and of trial and has felt after some divine and sure support, the more beautiful, the more sweet and comforting and quickening will he find this music. Therefore it becomes a duty, in the making up of serial musical programmes with a view to higher musical culture, to open now and then some glimpses into this too long strange element of the divinest and sincerest music ever written, and so make a beginning, by little and little, with our public of an acquaintance with Sebastian Bach; for so long as he remains a stranger to us, we have not yet penetrated into the holy of holies of the temple of harmony, nor is our life intrinsically musical. Like an old masterpiece of painting, an Aria like this must be brought out from time to time,—the same piece—and seen in a better and better light, with better skill of exhibition (or performance) and better preparation on the hearer's part: and while we listen or muse afterwards, the fire will surely burn within us. True, its appeal is most interior and private, and therefore what is called effect with a large audience, followed by loud applause, is not to be expected; it is too good for that. But when a few of these melodies shall thus have become somewhat familiarized to our best audience, when their sweetness shall have sunk into the souls of not a few, then there will come the strong desire to hear, and the ardor and courage to study and perform the Passion Music as a whole, and we shall stand more on the level of the advanced musical culture of to-day, and shall know better how to assign to every kind of music its due and relative degree of consequence. Mrs. BARRY is so far our best interpreter of such serious, sustained, sincere, quiet melody. She has studied it with real interest, and though her tones do not carry all the weight nor thrill with all the brightness of some singers, yet the rich, sweet, sympathetic quality of her voice, her excellent phrasing, and above all the refinement and expression of her singing, go far to make Bach's music truly felt. Since her brief stay abroad she seems to give out her tones with greater freedom, and by the earnest, close attention of the whole audience it was evident that the piece was more truly appreciated than ever before. What she lacked of opportunity (in a piece so sombre) for more open, livelier response, she had in full measure in the three charming songs by Schumann, Handel, and Franz,—each a model in its kind, and sung delightfully, with fine pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. PARKER.

The Concerto in G minor by Moscheles was given, for the first time in Boston, partly in honor to the memory of the master, who died last March in Leipzig, one of the foremost musical characters of the last half century, the friend of Mendelssohn, the pupil of Beethoven, intimate with all the great musicians, one of the most renowned of teachers and as a man so honored and beloved by all. His piano compositions are very numerous; and there is much among them, of his earlier and middle period, which deserves to live. Among the Concertos of importance, when we go outside of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Chopin, (and our concerts have long since, with the exception of Mozart, exhausted that list), what remains of equal interest with this which is esteemed the best of those by Moscheles? It ranks at least with those by Hummel, and, to our mind, has far more of original poetic quality, where the other has but graceful passage work. The first movement is full of fine and delicate beauty. The lading theme, and still more the melodious second theme, both presented at some length first in the finely instrumented orchestral prelude, are of a most winning character. The further exposition and variation of them by the piano is entirely in the genius of the instrument and grows in interest to the end. There is a delicate and subtle charm throughout all its modulations and changes of form and phrase. A thoroughly genial first movement, in the handling of the orchestra as well as of the principal instrument. Only too delicate, perhaps, for full appreciation by a great audience at a first hearing. The Adagio, opening with horns and bassoons in rich, solemn chords, seems almost too short, so full of beauty is it; and the manner in which the six-eight rhythm of the Finale grows out of what seems but a passing ornamental figure (in triplets) of the Adagio, is quite felicitous. Mr. PARKER played it con amore, entering fully into the spirit of the work, as if he were doing heartfelt honor to his old Leipzig master. Indeed he never played so well; from first to last it was all clear, clean, finely phrased, with a crisp, vital accent, and a true intelligence and taste combined with a remarkably free and finished technique. Both the piece and the performance gave great satisfaction, though of course Beethoven smiles with a surer, grander power, and Chopin wows with a more irresistible, seductive invitation, (which the good Moscheles, however, did resist).

At the close of such a concert, the very familiar, brilliant Overture to "Tell" might seem superfluous. But it was perhaps in refreshing contrast to the rather subdued and meditative tone of the whole programme, and it was one of those thoroughly "popular" things so often called for, which happens at the same time to be thoroughly good.

This week [Seventh Concert] Schumann takes his turn as Symphonist, with the E-flat, or "Cologne" Symphony. This forming the second part; the first part consisting of his "Genoevera" Overture; Chopin's F-minor Concerto, played by Hugo LERONARD; and a new composition by Bennett, called Fantasia-Overture to Moore's "Paradise and the Peri."

For the Eighth Concert [Thursday, Feb. 23] the programme offers: Part I. Overture to "Medea," Cherubini; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Gade. [It has been found impossible to procure the parts for Gade in A minor; but this No. 1 is by far his best, and has not been heard here for several years]. Part II. Schumann's Overture to Byron's "Manfred," and an Entr'acte from the same, never before played here; for conclusion the Orchestral Suite in C, by Raff (first time).

MR. B. J. LANG's second Concert at the Globe Theatre, Feb. 2, had the same select, large audience, and offered the following matter:

Quintet in C, Op. 163, for two Violins, Viola and two 'Cellos. . . . . Franz Schubert.
Allegro ma non troppo. Adagio espressivo. Scherzo.
Finale.
Pianoforte Concerto in C major, Op. 15. . . . . Beethoven.
Allegro con brio. Largo. Allegro.
Ballade in A flat major, op. 49. . . . . Chopin.
Trio in D minor, for Pianoforte, Violin and 'Cello.
Molto Allegro agitato. Andante con moto tranquillo.
Scherzo. Allegro assai appassionato.

The Schubert Quintet with two 'Cellos (Messrs. FRIES and AUG. HEINDL,—the violins and viola by Messrs. SCHULTZE, MEISEL and RYAN), has been an important feature in the Mendelssohn Quintette Club programmes, from time to time, these ten years, and it is always welcome for its rich, full polyphony, and large plan in accordance therewith, as well as for the genuine flavor and the Schwung (as Germans say) of the Schubert genius. Mr. LANG had ample sphere for all his fine, clear, finished technique, and tasteful phrasing and accent in the earliest of Beethoven's five Concertos, which, though by no means so grand as the fifth or so subtly poetic as the fourth, is full of charm, singularly naive and honest. It had been played but once before in Boston, and then by Mr. Lang at a Symphony Concert three years ago. This time, with only the shadow of an orchestra (string quartet with double-bass) it sounded to us more dry and tame than then; and the very elaborate cadenzas (by Moscheles?) seemed drawn out to tedious length. The Scherzando character of the Finale is full of crisp, sunshiny humor. We are thankful for the too rare chance of hearing such a work. The Ballade of Chopin, beginning grave and march like, was finely rendered. But the real awakening life of the concert was in the superb Mendelssohn Trio, which went to a charm.

For next Thursday afternoon Mr. Lang's programme shows: a Quartet (No. 67) by Haydn; a Capriccio, for piano, by Bennett (E major, op. 22); for another piano solo, List's "Benediction de Dieu dans la Solitude;" and the great B-flat Trio of Beethoven.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY.—A goodly show of talent and of progress was made by pupils of Mr. EICHENBERG's school at the quarterly concert in the crowded Boston Music Hall last Wednesday afternoon. They were all solo performances. The most remarkable, and indeed exceptionally interesting, were the specimens of violin playing by a picturesque young girl of hardly thirteen (Miss Persis Bell), and a still younger lad (Master A. Van Raalte). The former played the Andante from the Mendelssohn Concerto with purity of tone, true intonation and good style, really surprising. The boy, a bright and playful looking chit, was equally successful with the well known Mayseder variations. And both together gave a clear, euphonious rendering of a by no means easy Duo Concertante by Dancs. It is something, truly, if we have begun to raise such pupils, though the cases doubtless are exceptional. There was good piano playing: of a Chopin Waltz, by Miss C. B. Nickels; a Duo from Rigoletto (Wolff) by Misses Starr and Nickels; a Mendelssohn Capriccio, by Miss Smith, and, particularly, the first movement of the Beethoven Sonata in B flat, op. 22, by Miss E. Spicer. The singing, chiefly under Mme. JOHANNSEN's direction, she playing the accompaniment, was highly creditable; that of the Prayer and Barcarolle from Mevber's "Star of the North," by Miss Huntington, was indeed remarkable and full of promise. The two pieces on the Great Organ (a Vorspiel by Bach, and part of one of Handel's Concertos) we did not hear.

THE sweetest songs are those
That few men ever hear
And no men ever sing.

The clearest skies are those
That farthest off appear
To birds of strongest wing.

The dearest loves are those
That no man can come near
With his best following.

—Robert Kelley Weeks.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Evening Bulletin (Jan 16) speaks of a series of concerts, than which none in this country were ever yet conceived with a more pure artistic motive, or persevered in with a more disinterested, brave devotion. We are glad to hear that the effort persisted in, largely at her own cost, for several years, by the lady who originated them, is at length beginning to meet with its reward. The Bulletin says:

Miss Jackson's Parlor Concert at Natatorium Hall, last Saturday night, was one of the most delightful of a very charming series. The programme was filled with selections from classical composers, and it found in the fine artists who conduct these entertainments skilful and sympathetic interpreters. The playing of Mr. Hennig and of Gubelman was especially good. The former gentleman never fails to display exquisite taste in his violinello performances, while Mr. Gubelman, with his violin, invariably gives satisfaction. These concerts deserve more generous support than they have received. They are so good that it ought not to be difficult to crowd the hall wherever they are given.

Of Mr. Jarvis's third Soirée the same journal tells us:

The following remarkably interesting programme was presented:

Piano Solo—Suite in G. . . . . Domenico Scarlatti.
Sonata—Piano and Violin, No. 2, op. 78. . . . . Raff.
Messrs. Jarvis and Kopta.
Concerto—Violoncello, B minor, No. 3. . . . . Goitermann.
Rudolph Hennig.
Piano Solos—1. Abandoned. . . . . Schumann.
2. Novellette, E major, Op. 21. . . . . " "
Violin Solo—Suite for Violin. . . . . Vieuxtemps.
Wenzel Kopta.
Trio—Piano, Violin and 'Cello, F major, op. 6. . . . . Bargiel.

The studies of Scarlatti and the novellette of Schumann are at the very opposite extremes in piano-forte music, and their introduction at the same concert was a happy thought of Mr. Jarvis, for the contrast was a most interesting and instructive one. There is little danger that the claims or the merits of the latter composer will be overlooked, in our time, at least; but there was reason to fear that this fate might have been Scarlatti's, had not Mr. Hans von Bülow, in his enthusiastic researches, discovered among other valuable works these very interesting studies. Mr. Jarvis, accomplished in all the schools, interpreted them with proper fidelity to the traditions, and at his hands none of their perennial freshness and beauty was lost. The Toccata may be particularized as having been endowed by him with a charm which many very skilful artists would have failed to give it. The Sonata by Raff is not entirely new here, it having been given by Messrs. Wolfsohn and Colonne. Its merit, in many respects, is great, and a first hearing of it inclines one to the faith that, "being of the gods," it is destined to endure; but familiarity with it will, we think, have the effect of abating much of our enthusiasm for it. The romantic school has added much that is already valuable to the musician's repertoire, but a great part of the sonata is romanticism run wild, and, in spite of the graceful beauty of the slow movement, the work, in its completeness lacks the indescribable element which forever distinguishes genius from mere talent.

Mr. Hennig's performance of the Goitermann Concerto was characterized by absolute perfection of intonation, and a vigorous bowing and brilliancy of execution which surprised us even in this accomplished artist. He has never done better than upon this occasion.

Mr. Kopta's selections were not especially happy. Mr. Vieuxtemps, in these pieces, excites our curiosity, perhaps, but not our interest. The same ground has been gone over so frequently by Bach and Handel, that the present composer would have been surer of success in fresher fields. His other works in the modern style all possess abundance of merit; and if Mr. Kopta had produced any of them with the skill and expression that he gave to these palpable imitations, he would have had reason to be very proud of himself.

There remains to commend Mr. Jarvis's delicate treatment of the exquisitely graceful Raff transcription, and his intelligent interpretation of the novellette of Schumann, a noble and genial composition, requiring brains and marvellous technique to give it adequate justice, and the artistic performance of the Bargiel trio, a really enjoyable work, which never would have been written, perhaps, had Robert Schumann never lived.

Philadelphia is, or has been, just now indulging in the Thomas Orchestra concerts, in Miss Kellogg's concerts, and in the English Opera (offering such works as the "Marriage of Figaro," "Martha," "Fidelio," "Oberon," and "Der Freyschütz.") Nienkonn's David was sung lately by the Handel and Haydn Society.

PORTLAND, ME.—"The Rossini Club" is an association of young ladies, pupils of the best teachers here, who meet weekly and practise for mutual instruction and pleasure. They gave last month their first public concert, to raise money to buy a pianoforte. The following selections, we are told, were all done really well:

Overture: "Die Waldnymph," arranged for 4 hands. Bennett.
Song: "Bird of the merry greenwood. . . . . Abt.
Vocal Quartet: "La Carità. . . . . Rossini.
Rondo. . . . . Weber.
Duet: "La Regata. . . . . Veneziani.

Trio: "Vieni al mar. . . . . Gordigiani.
Solo: "Se Crudele. . . . . Donizetti.
Scotch Symphony (two movements), 4 h'ds. Mendelssohn.
Aria: "Oll angul d' inferno," from "Magic Flute. . . . . Mozart.

Chorus: "The Lord is my Shepherd. . . . . Schubert.

NEW YORK.—The Sun's critic says of the third Philharmonic Concert:

It was much better in the selection of the pieces played than in the manner in which they were given. In the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, by Schumann, there was some unusually crude and slovenly playing. There were times when belated instruments were heard coming in after the others at a pause, and there was also a general lack of finish in much that was done.

This was the more noticeable by contrast with the recent concerts given by Theodore Thomas's orchestra, which were in every respect superior to those of the Philharmonic Society. There are disadvantages as well as advantages in a large orchestra. The Mozart symphony, for instance, which was played on Saturday evening, was written for an orchestra half the size of this one. Its delicacy and grace were rather overpowered by the number of the instruments. Mr. Bergmann appeared in the triple character of conductor, composer and performer. A romance for bass clarinet, with accompaniment for two clarinets and two bassoons, composed by him, was given. It was a most melodious and admirably constructed composition, and served to display the qualities of an instrument so rich, warm, and powerful in tone, so extended in scale, and so beautifully voiced, that it is an exceeding pity that it should not have found its place among orchestral instruments. It was admirably played by Mr. Boehm; and when we consider that to play an ordinary clarinet well is the work of a lifetime, he deserves double credit for the skill with which he managed this exceptional instrument. The effect of these five bass reeds played together was very peculiar.

The color of the tone was sombre, deep, warm, and rich. There is always a soft languor in the sound of combined reeds moving "To the Dorian mood

Of flutes and soft recorders;"

and this composition was full of that subtle and soothing beauty.

Much alike in spirit was the serenade for four violoncellos by Lachner, in which Bergmann played second cello, Bergner playing the first. Mr. Bergmann has a strong and manly way of playing this instrument, somewhat in contrast with that of Mr. Bergner, who, though indisputably a consummate musician, resorts too constantly to the tremolo. It is a trick that catches the popular ear; but when too often used, it demoralizes and weakens the general style. It is like that fatal vibrating quality of the voice that many of our singers think so fine and pathetic, and cultivate in that unhappy delusion.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 30.—There has been plenty of music in New York during the month of January. On the 14th inst. Miss Marie Krebs commenced a series of superb piano-forte recitals at Steinway's small hall. This is the programme to the first:

Sonata, E flat, op. 29.....	Beethoven.
Ave Maria.....	Mme. Krebs.
.....	Mme. Krebs-Michaelis.
Cat Fugue.....	Scarlatti.
Impromptu, A flat.....	Chopin.
Nocturne, No. 4, D.....	Schumann.
.....	Mme. Krebs.
Waldgesang.....	Schumann.
.....	Mme. Krebs-Michaelis.
Moonlight Sonata, C minor.....	Beethoven.
.....	Mme. Krebs.
Der Neugieriger.....	F. Schubert.
Valencia's Rose.....	O. Krebs.
.....	Mme. Krebs-Michaelis.
Waltz, F major.....	Rubinstein.
Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 4.....	Liszt.
.....	Mme. Krebs.

The audience was the most critical that has been seen in Steinway Hall for many months, for almost every pianist known in New York was present. The programmes were excellently rendered. At the 3rd, on January 28, she was assisted by Mr. Wenzel Kopta (violin) and Mr. Wm. Candidus (tenor). The fourth and last takes place this week.

Miss Kellogg made her first appearance in this city, in oratorio, on Thursday, the 19th inst., with great success, though it would have been much better if she had selected some other building than the Academy of Music, which is the last place in New York to hold an oratorio performance in. The chorus sang well, but the orchestra was a disgrace to New York.

Theo. Thomas visited us last week, after a long absence, and gave two fine concerts. At the first (Jan. 27th) Miss Mehlig played Liszt's Concerto in E flat, the orchestra playing a mixed programme. The second (Jan. 28) was a grand symphony concert, with this programme:

Symphony, No. 6, "Pastorale".....	Beethoven.
Concerto in E minor.....	Chopin.
.....	Mme. Mehlig.
Overture, "Faust".....	Wagner.
Septet, op. 21.....	Beethoven.
Hexameron [duet].....	Liszt.
.....	Mme. Mehlig and Mr. Mills.
Poème Symphonique: "Les Preludes".....	Liszt.

The orchestra played superbly, and so did Miss Mehlig. The audience was a large, orderly and attentive one. These are the only concerts which can be given by Theo. Thomas here this winter. He will of course return in the spring to Central Park Garden.

The third Philharmonic Concert of the season takes place next Saturday. The orchestral pieces are as follows:

Symphony, D, "French".....	Mozart.
Overture, "Sakuntala".....	Goldmark.
Overture, Scherzo et finale, op. 62.....	Schumann.

The soloists are Mr. F. Bergner (violin) and Mr. E. Boehm (bass-clarinet).

The Church Music Association have in preparation for their second concert (Feb. 21) a new overture by Lindpainter "Jubel," Beethoven's Mass in C (played last year, and repeated by general request), and the "Spring" from Haydn's Seasons. They have also the entire music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, for the last concert.

J. M. W.

MACON, (GEORGIA), JAN. 30.—The Maconites enjoyed last week an entertainment by the "Adelaide Philipps Concert Company," which was refreshing to music lovers after a season of musical dearth.

Miss Philipps came unheralded and unadvertised; and as she enjoys a reputation more local than continental, very few had heard of the fair cantatrice. But we presume to say none could have felt any disappointment in her wonderful contralto voice. The compass of her voice, as well as her executive skill, as exhibited in her rendering of that hackneyed concert aria: "Una voce poco fa," was astonishing. It seemed to us a perfect piece of vocalization. She very graciously responded to all the encores, as did the other artists, and we were thereby compensated for a too short programme. A little ballad which she gave as an encore, called, we believe, "The Angel of the Rosebush," sung in a hushed, suppressed sotto voce (most effectively after a Laughing Song) still haunts us like a tuneful, sad spirit. But let me ask if public singers will never weary of "Comin' thro' the Rye," and if claqueurs will never cease applauding it! The coquetry of that bonnie Scotch lass is now acknowledged, and she certainly must be passée.

Mons. Levy excited a furor with his matchless performance on the Cornet. What a charming instrument it is in the hands of an accomplished player! His skillful producing and sustaining the voluptuous tones of the familiar melody, "The Last Rose of Summer," deliciously excited our musical sensibilities, and enfolded us in a reverie, from which we sighed to be aroused.

Mr. Ed. Hoffman, we suppose, would be startled to hear himself called a great artist or an homme de génie. He is neither, but we enjoyed his music notwithstanding. He played several original compositions with a pleasing grace and limpidity, on a light and sweet-toned Knabe Piano, just suited to his style. The "Last Hope," by Gottschalk, however, was rendered by him with less sentiment than we have heard from many amateurs. Mons. Hasler, if he had not been so extravagantly announced, would have astounded us more; but we can say he had a pleasing voice, of no particular strength, compass or cultivation.

We left the hall grateful. Grateful that these refined musicians had not passed us by, and that we had been mildly, not wildly entertained for one evening with music not severely artistic, but adapted to a people as yet untutored in musical classics.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 16. Mr. Editor:—In your Journal of Music of this week you publish a letter dated at Washington, D. C., in which appears the claim of the Choral Society of Washington to be the first American Society formed in the country for the production of male voice music. The "Abt" Society of Philadelphia was organized in 1867 in this city, and at present consists of about thirty of the picked (male) singers of Philadelphia. No one has yet been admitted who is below the standard originally set up, consequently there is no "dead wood." They have twice performed Mendelssohn's Cantata "Sons of Art," which was given up by the German Societies in despair. In using the "Chickering Collection" they took "at sight" any number of the collection yet published, which you will see is a fair test of ability. The Conductor is Mr. Michael H. Cross of the Cathedral, a finished conductor and composer. The Vocal Union, a society of about the same number of members, not rating as high as the "Abt," has nevertheless a strong and well-balanced collection of voices. Conductor, E. J. Wolkieffer. They are the juniors of the "Abt" by about a year, so that two of our societies are older than the "Choral," and will be happy to contest the palm with them at any time.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Proposal. 4. Bb to f. M. S. Downs. 40

Words by Bayard Taylor. Charming sweet poem, melody and accompaniment. Sung by Nilsson.

"The violet loves a sunny bank,
The cowslip loves the lee,
The scarlet creeper loves the elm,
But I love thee!"

Separation. 4. Eb to e. M. S. Downs. 40

With its varied harmony and deep pathos, resembles one of the best German songs.

Those scenes which were so dear to me; or, The Georgian maid's farewell. 3. F to g. Henry Schoeller. 30

Very graceful melody. The words are well written, and contain a farewell to the hills of Georgia.

Two Little Shoes. Ballad. 3. Ab to d. Dr. Crabbe. 30

Very sweet and pathetic.

"Two little shoes laid away in the drawer,
Treasured so fondly,—never to be worn.
Two little feet laid away in the tomb
Cold and all lifeless,—sadly we mourn."

Instrumental.

Our Society Galop. 3. Db. H. B. Hart. 30

Mellow and sweet rather than brilliant. Not only "our" society, but societies in general will be pleased to hear it.

Poetry of Motion. Danse Caprice. 5. C. S. B. Whitney. 60

Mr. Whitney has been very fortunate in the composition of this beautiful piece, which cannot fail to make a sensation, when played with any degree of taste and execution. The melody of the dance is remarkably pretty, and the intermediate passages give all needed power and sprightliness.

Juvenile Reception Waltz. 3. F. Charles J. Grass. 35

Good for a juvenile student. Has a pretty air, a tremolo, and some good runs for the left hand.

You know how it is yourself. Polka. 3. F. Joseph Poznanski. 40

A characteristic and sprightly polka, with the melody of a favorite song.

Montague. Mazurka Polka Caprice. 3. Eb. John Simpson. 30

Varies to two, four and five flats, and has also a great variety of time and of arrangement, and is brilliant and melodious.

Books.

EATON'S NEW METHOD FOR THE CORNET. 1.50

This handsome and complete book contains a good elementary course, plain directions, a fine selection of favorite airs, so arranged that they may be played with the ordinary piano accompaniment, and a few difficult pieces, trios, &c. As the Cornet (or Little horn,) is not out of place, when softly played, in ordinary rooms, this book will furnish a new inducement to learn it.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

To the Telegraph.

Thou wondrous living chord
Of Earth's mysterious lyre,
What message dost thou bring
To fill the soul's desire?

Like the Eolian harp
Thou moonest to the blast,
But wilder, deeper tones
Along thy lines have passed.

Sighs from all sorrowing hearts
Give thee thy ceaseless pain,
Sweep o'er thy trembling strings
And breathe to heaven the strain.

But not with grief alone
Man's restless heart is torn,
Not only notes of woe
Upon thy strings are borne.

Hope, triumph, joy and love,
These beating bosoms fill,
With every pulse of life
Thy swift vibrations thrill.

With all sweet harmonies
That move the human breast
O blend one strain from heaven
And make us wholly blest.

The Opera.

NEW YORK, FEB. 17.—The first performance of Herr Krackajokeky's new Opera, "Orpheus in Hades," on Monday evening last, at the new East River Theatre, was a decided sensation in our dramatic and musical world. We can give in words but a faint idea of the original work, or of its spirited representation. The composer is a young man, as yet unknown to fame, but we venture to predict for him a highly successful career. The character of the orchestra he has so admirably organized and drilled, is something entirely new and original. Profoundly impressed with the importance of introducing into his musical score and instrumentation, as much of the infernal element as was necessary to carry out his vivid idea of the celebrated descent of the old poet into the Plutonic regions, he has not hesitated to make use of many instruments not usually employed in modern orchestration. The scenery, too, and the whole mise en scene, is as original and novel as the music and libretto. We were not near enough to distinguish clearly the precise form of many of the musical instruments used, (and unfortunately had left our opera-glass at home) but in the dim and lurid lights which most of the scenes demand, they appeared to bear strong resemblance to some familiar articles in household and culinary use:—such as tongs, shovels, pokers, coal-scuttles, gridirons and copper kettles. In this, however, we may be mistaken. The effect of these, in some of the fortissimo movements of the choruses, may be more easily imagined than described.

There is one striking scene,—where Orpheus is entering the Inferno, in which the Chinese gong is used with thrilling effect. Still more striking is the use of this instrument where the singer first approaches the Styx—whose rattling and thumping in the opening Bangando movement, is certainly startling, to say the least: not to speak of the display of Satanic fire-works in the background—in which the wheel of Ixion is turned into a revolving fire-wheel. Critics may object to this reversion of the old fable, in which the wheel aforesaid stood still at the sound of the Orphean lyre. But true genius should not be bound by any servile bonds to any literal adherence to such superannuated myths.

There is one exceedingly novel and effective scene in the second act, in which the three-headed guardian of the portals of Pluto opens in a remarkable trio. The composer has conceived the original idea of a large dog-headed, triple-mouthed mask, under which are esconced the three deep basso singers, Signor Growloni, Signor Rorrio, and Signor Snarliani. We regret that we cannot report the music, as we do the words of this Trio, and the chorus of the Furies. Nothing can be finer in its way than the transition of the fierce Cerberus from his determined opposition to the intruder, down through gradually subsiding semitones and chromatic intervals, into the slumberous state produced by the music of Orpheus.

TRIO BY CERBERUS.

First Head.

Bow wow! what strolling singer's this
A-coming to the realms of Dis!

Second Head.

That feller that's a-comin' here,
He seems to be some poet seer.

Third Head.

Now don't make such a tarnal fuss!
This is the celebrated Orpheus!

TRIO OF HEADS.

A pretty fellow for a bard!
Seize him, furies, grip him hard!
Entrance here we can't allow,
Bite him, tear him! bow-wow-wow!

CHORUS OF FURIES AND DEMONS.

Snarly, growly, howly, yow!
Keep away sir, or we vow
We will knock you all to flinders,
And then burn you into cinders.
Bring not here your twangling lyre!
Back, I say—or I will fire!

SOLO BY ORPHEUS.

Oh where in Heh—heh—hades
Is she, the queen of ladies?
Wherever can she be,
My lost Eurydice!

TRIO BY CERBERUS (derisively.)

You're rid, I see,
You're rid, I see,
Of her who used your wife to be.
Go back! You'll never find her here,
We'll bite you, if you come too near!

First Head.

He's tuning his guitar—I vow!
T'wont do, old fellow! Bow-wow-wow!

Second Head.

His singing makes me stretch and yawn,
A lovely opera air—I swan!

Third Head.

I'm losing all my Bow-wow-wowzy!
That music makes me awful drowsy!

The three Cerberean heads here all pass through drowsy semitones, and finally unite in a snoring trio, forming a very original bass, to a more original air sung by Orpheus, but the poetry of which is too long and doleful to transcribe.

The part of Eurydice was very touchingly rendered, especially when her husband is forbidden by the fates to touch her.

On the whole we venture to believe that the Cerberus scene will become very popular, and that we shall soon hear snatches of the airs and choruses warbled in our streets—especially after midnight—by the Bow-wow-wowzy boys.

Marx's Characterization of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

BY A. E. KROEGER.

FIRST PART.—SECOND MOVEMENT.

The first movement has furnished no satisfaction; it has not even opened a prospect of it, as does the first movement of the C-minor Symphony, which, where it naturally could not bring the victorious decision, at least gathers together and advances the forces that ensure victory. Now this first movement of the Ninth Symphony swells to a titanic force, but its heart is full of sadness.

Then begins the second movement: Molto Vivace.

(SCHERZO, Introduction.) Once more the beat of Beethoven's life-awakening wizard staff gives the forcible sign (1st to 9th measure) and immediately the tone-spirits, obedient to the beckoning of their master, commence an airy, mysterious dance, (chief theme beginning at 9th measure). The second violin is in advance, the viola follows, then the violoncello, then the first violin, finally the double bass: and all, softly and mysteriously, with the same restless, rhythmical haste and breathless endlessness; only the violins are reinforced by the oboe, and the violas by the oboe and clarinet. It is not the melody, nor this or that voice,—for they all float minglingly in a confusing indistinction of each other—which here gives significance; the significance lies altogether in the inexhaustibleness of this life and in the ghost-like, incessant movement; ghostlike, because to human movement this equality of hasty, unmeasured motion would not be adequate. These dance vortices increase from their secret beginning into a wild, loud-crying exultation, in which the oddly-placed trumpet daringly mixes, as it may happen. The tone-forms, without slacking their restlessness, gradually vanish (77th measure) after the noisy triumph of their fairy-dance, and a sort of doubting meditation seems to take hold of them, when, behold! the same theme with great vigor and with a remarkable change (118th measure) fixes itself again and maintains itself amidst the defiant interruptions of all the string instruments and throughout all the octaves—they beat sixteen times before the conclusion—and yet that secret dubiousness does not vanish.

Now, finally,—at the conclusion of the first part of this movement, which is repeated—the dizzy dance stops, and stops again, in order to repeat itself in a still dizzier way in the second part; the choruses of string instruments alternate with the wind instruments in sounding the introductory theme, and with increased haste (the rhythm of four measures changed into one of three measures) the chief theme again hurries past.

It is an endless, breathless, giddy life, full of mystery, a life inexhaustible and unsatisfied, with no aim in it nor indication of any outside of itself. The excited play of these phantom-creatures, that hide in the instruments, and then elf-like flash out with their ringing laughter, gives no satisfaction to the soul and to man's craving for man.

Suddenly all this life hurries away, the three four time changes into four four, and a new life picture has arisen with wondrous rapidity. (Trio). A new world of existence, altogether unsuggested by what has passed before, opens itself and gently beckons the dizzy dancers into its peaceful circle. Lovingly, like remembrances of youth, balsamic like the pure breath of the meadows and forests, and simple in the charms of its country innocence, this song (412th measure) is borne along by the united oboes, clarionets and fagots, with the breath of a quiet, soothing consolation; there is a sort of festivity, of country-devotion in the evening's quiet, in the second part of the second movement. Lovingly the master dwells upon this picture, so far as heart and art permit. All the instruments are called to enjoy this life of peace; the horns with their gentle echo, accompanied on high by the violin (at first it was the bassoon down low), the bassoons accompanied by the sharp flute, finally even the trumpets with their ten-fold horn-sound, for such is here their effect. It is always the same picture, which smiles at you with the same smile, and evermore seems to change form and color. It is enchantment.

Is there satisfaction in this second part? Clearly not, since all soul-connection with the first part and with all the parts of the first movement is wanting. And this Beethoven has thoroughly felt. The picture vanishes, the dance tries to begin again (538th measure) and vanishes, the song sounds once more—(556-563d measures)—a few beats—and all has vanished.

And now it is decided. This world of instruments, so full of life, so thousand formed, so soul entrancing, carrying the imagination further above the limits of the human than any other art can do, is nevertheless not in itself sufficient to give full satisfaction. •

This is not a mere assumption or a conclusion drawn from some assumed premise. Beethoven himself testifies to it with words spoken by himself. But, taking it for the present as simply an assumption, it completely explains the idea of the work, as we have sought to establish it, and the meaning of every movement and part of a movement, and their want of connection with and relation to each other. We will add at once that the same holds good in regard to the third movement, which follows now, the Adagio.

It is true there is not an absolute want of connection and relation in these movements, only we do not discover the relation in the movements themselves; it does not exhibit itself till after the third movement.

THIRD MOVEMENT.

This third movement, in B flat major, and marked Adagio molto e cantabile, is the parting-word. Immersed in love, grandly conceived, and full of inexhaustible melancholy, as a grand and strong character of this life parts from infinite memories.

Two choirs, of the wind and of the string instruments, alternate with each other, commingling their sad strains; and two thoughts: the presence at parting, and the past with its remembrances and its smile amidst tears, follow each other and change. externally clearly divided, as was proper to the transfigured vision of Beethoven, and internally one, two sides of the self same face.

The wind instruments begin with their soft, plaintive accents, soon supported by the lower string instruments; then the string instruments, without the double-basses, start the low parting-song steeped in devotion and melancholy. The clarionet, fagotts and horns echo the conclusion; and thus in ever solemn measuredness, though with profoundest emotion, the first, second, third and fourth strophe pass by. In the last the wind instruments repeat the conclusion, and finally, the overflowing, soulful clarionet leading the chorus,—the whole last strophe rises high, as if the heart could not grasp it.

At this point the wind instruments enter with the deep bass viols and strike some arpeggios, like the harp-sounds of a prelude or afterlude, whereupon the chord changes from f-a-c-e flat to f-sharp-a-d, which is to stand for D major; and then commences the second movement of the Adagio, with the signature Andante moderato. In all respects different from the Adagio, it yet is related to it in the general character of its emotion. It was not an arbitrary expression, when we spoke at first of this melody awakening remembrances, the melody as well as the bass seems—just as in the Trio of the C-sharp minor Sonata—to suggest an echo of beautiful peaceful hours, which here, however, are veiled with sorrow by the more shadowy-sound of the viola and second violin in the melody, by the at times interrupted movement of the basses, the quietly (on A) brooding violoncello, the cutting sobs of the first bassoon and of the clarionet, and afterwards of the oboe and the flute.

We cannot follow the third movement any further. It has shaped itself into the form of variations, in order to imprint its meaning more and more intensely on the heart. At the end the will of the master arises high and in unbroken force, even though the tears still dim his eyes. But the song closes as it began.

[Conclusion next time.]

The History of Music.

NINTH LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

[Reported for the Daily Advertiser, Feb. 4.]

The subject on Saturday last was Italian opera in the eighteenth century. For nearly a hundred years Italy produced not only the greatest number but the most eminent composers, and held the rest of the world in a species of musical bondage. Sketches were given of the lives and a description of the music of very many of these. Durante, who was born in 1684 and died in 1755, was an eminent musician. He did not much in the way of dramatic composition, but devoted himself chiefly to church and chamber music. He was more renowned as a great contrapuntist than as a melodist. He improved the methods of orchestration and gave some of the earliest indications in this direction of the great movement which has since played such an important part in the development of music. His church music was characteristic of the times, being less elevated and much more sensuous than that of Palestrina. He composed a great number of works, but was, after all, much greater as a teacher than as a composer. He was outshone by his pupil and rival, Leonardo Leo, who was most famous as a melodist. Leo was very popular in his day, and was excelled as a melodist by none of his time. He has, however, been too highly praised by a later musician of the same era—Pacini. Mr. Paine passed briefly over some of the composers of this time. One was mentioned whose music was very much disliked by the Emperor Charles VI., because it abounded so greatly in shakes. At last he was persuaded to hear a new piece by this composer. The hint had been given to the composer, and the piece proceeded without a single shake or trill. When the last number began it was found to be a fugue movement which started off with four trilled notes. As the theme was taken up by the several parts there was a bewilderment and complication of trills which caused the emperor to laugh outright, and the joke was so good that it was the beginning of the composer's fortune. The style of Vinci, another composer of this era, caused a German writer, commenting on the absurdities of Italian music, to say that the Italian composers made the characters in their operas sing for fifteen minutes on the words "à la, à la," before letting the audience know that they were trying to say "à la vendetta!"

Pergolesi was one of the best known composers of this time in Naples. He improved and made his greatest successes in opera buffa, although not the originator of that style. He became very popular by some of his operas of this character and essayed a grand serious opera, which had so little success that Pergolesi, mortified and disappointed, abandoned writing for the stage and composed only for the church. He died prematurely of consumption at the age of twenty-seven years. One of his latest compositions was the famous "Stabat Mater," which is still known, performed and admired. The first number, a very beautiful duet, was sung by Mrs. West and Mrs. Barry. Mr. Paine called attention to the resemblance it bears to some of Mozart's earliest compositions, but he said of the work as a whole that it is distinguished rather for sweetness than for grandeur, and hardly deserves the place it has maintained.

Jomelli, born in 1714, was held in very high esteem at first, but was later in life treated with only cold respect. This was perhaps partly due to the change which came over his style of composition, which must be called an improvement, after his visit to Germany. Sacchini, born in 1728, surpassed all of his time in opera buffa, and was the favorite composer of the anti-Gluck party in Paris, in a contest famous in the history of music. Mr. Rudolphsen sang a very interesting and beautiful aria from an opera by Sacchini, showing the style of the school of that age. Paisiello was one of the most eminent composers of the time, and his operas are almost the only ones of that era which are still performed.

The progress of the opera in the first half of the eighteenth century was almost wholly confined to the musical part of it, and but very little improvement was made in its dramatic form. The several points in which improvement was made were noted by Mr. Paine, and an interesting indication of the low state of the opera and of opera management was given in a series of amusing and satirical instructions by Marcello to composers, singers and managers. Sordani and Lotti, two famous Venetian composers, were sketched and a selection of the music of each was sung. The first was a duet from a cantata by Sordani, sung by Mrs. West and Dr. Langmaid. Mr. Paine remarked that the music of Steffani reminds one of Palestrina by its purity and elevated character, and of Handel in other respects. Indeed Handel was known to have composed duets in the manner of Steffani. The praise accorded to his music was fully justified by the piece sung, but it was by no means so pleasing as a duo song by Lotti, sung by Mrs. Barry, which immediately followed. The resemblance to Handel's music in the latter was very marked, and the melody was most beautiful.

In conclusion Mr. Paine spoke quite briefly of the Roman and Bolognese composers, Galuppi, Bononcini and Haase, describing their music and their connection with the London movement against Handel, but giving no selections from their works.

TENTH LECTURE, FEB. 11.

[Reported for the Boston Journal.]

The subject was "Italian Masters of Singing. Musical Theorists and Instrumental Music to the end of the 18th century." He said the great Italian school of singing was universally acknowledged as the only true vocal art which history records. Among the reasons for this was the language, which was music of itself, and the musical temperament of the people, which displayed itself as spontaneously as the song of birds. Then again the natural sequence of events in the latter middle ages readily accounted for the cultivation of artistic singing in that country. It received a new impulse with the advent of solo singing, early in the 17th century, and reached its maturity as a system of voice culture in the last century. The latter part of the 18th century witnessed the full culmination of this art, which has so alarmingly degenerated at the present day. The development of vocal composition and the art of singing went hand in hand, and the founders of the opera and cantata, Caccini, Carissimi, Scarlatti and others, were singers and teachers of singing, as well as composers. During the middle ages women were debarred from participation in church music by ecclesiastical law, and the soprano and contralto parts were supplied by falsetto singers.

In Palestrina's time they were superseded by boy singers, and they in time were supplanted by male soprano and alto singers (castrati), who did not, however, enter the papal choir until 1625. This class of singers soon became very common and included the greatest virtuosi of the last century. The severe studies pursued by students of singing at that time resulted in a wonderful training of the voice. The first regular treatise on the art of singing was published by Giulio Caccini in 1601 at Florence. He treated of the art of perfect intonation; gave directions as to the execution of the trill, and declared that extended roulades and florid passages were by no means important to a good style of singing. He was accepted as the founder of the so called dramatic style of singing, in distinction from the chamber style, which found its origin at Rome under Carissimi. The greatest singers of the eighteenth century, Senesino, Carestini, Cuzzoni and others, united these two styles, and carried the art to the highest perfection it has ever attained. The host of excellent singers, performers and composers in Italy during this epoch was unprecedented, and the most delightful music resounded where one would ordinarily expect to find only the dreary of musicians.

The vocal school of Francesco Antonio Pistocchi, founded at Bologna in 1700, taught the method which has been the basis of all good singing to the present day. All the arts of practical singing were systematized; particular attention was paid to the quality of tone, and correctness and beauty of style were demanded as essentials of the art of musical delivery. Pistocchi was a thoroughly educated musician, and was respected as a composer and excellent soprano singer. Antoine Bernacchi, one of his most celebrated pupils, was a very successful teacher of the same methods. With a feeble voice at the outset, he developed it so wonderfully under the direction of his teacher, that he was pronounced by Handel to be the king of singers, and was for a long time connected with Handel's opera in London. He had many noted pupils, but the influence of his teachings extended to the greatest singers, Senesino, Carestini and Farinelli, who in a great measure adopted his style. At the middle of the 18th century, Italian singing had reached the full height of its glory, and the possessors of flexible voices became wealthy and self-important. In the eager desire to hear these wonderful voices, tenors and basses disappeared entirely from the opera, and as the public were attentive only to the solos, the singer was given full opportunity to display his voice and execution. The composer became the slave of the virtuoso, and even the heroic struggles of Handel against the cabal of Italian singers were for the time unavailing. Among these singers was Francesco Bernardi, commonly called Senesino, born at Siena in 1680, engaged by Handel in 1720, who sang at the Haymarket in London, until the musical quarrel broke out, when he joined an opposition company. Carestini, also called Cusanino, who succeeded Senesino in Handel's opera in 1733, possessed a voice of wonderful range and flexibility. Caffarelli, one of the most celebrated singers of the Neapolitan school, was born in 1703. He was a pupil of Porpora, and, according to some accounts, after receiving six years of eccentric instruction, was declared by his teacher to be the greatest singer in the world. He was looked upon as Farinelli's rival, and some critics considered him the greater singer.

Vittoria Lest, of the school of Bernacchi, was a remarkable contralto singer. The extraordinary compass of her voice enabled her to sing the bass airs in the opera with perfect ease. The greatest female singer of the last century was Faustina Berdoni, born at Venice in 1693, and she was for many years the chief ornament of the opera at Dresden. She was also remarkable for her personal charms. Her manner of singing was expressive and brilliant; her manner of execution finished. She possessed peculiar skill in the execution of the tremolo, could rival any instrument in rapid skips, and possessed wonderful powers of mimicry and action. Her only successful rival among her own sex was Francesca Cuzzoni, though she was inferior as an actor. She was a native of Parma, first appeared in the opera at Venice, and went to England in 1723, where she was held in high favor for several years, and then returned to her native land. While both these artists were in England the spirit of rivalry and jealousy possessed them to such an extravagant and even furious extent, that once when they happened to meet in public they came to blows. Cuzzoni having taken an oath that she would never accept a lower salary than her rival, the directors finding their interests in jeopardy, offered her a guinea less salary than Faustina, and thus compelled her to refuse the engagement; she left the country and died poor and neglected at Verona in 1770.

The greatest singer of all the remarkable virtuosi was Carlo Broschi, commonly called Farinelli. He was a scholar of Porpora, born at Andria, in Naples, in 1705. At the age of 17, in Rome, while singing an air with obligato trumpet accompaniment, he prolonged a note until the trumpeter was compelled to give up the contest, and then with smiling ease continued to hold, shake and swell the same note, and in the same breath introduced a series of rapid and difficult runs and passages until his voice was lost in a storm of applause.

From England he went to Madrid, where, by his wonderful power of song, he restored the despondent King, Philip V., to health. The King conferred high honors on him, and during the first ten years of his residence there he sang the same four airs to the King every night. After twenty-four years' service at the Spanish Court he retired, because the new King hated music, and passed the remainder of his life at Bologna. He was undoubtedly the greatest singer that ever lived, and his perfect intonation, noble style and power of artistic expression have never found an equal.

The present century had witnessed the decline of this beautiful art, and vain was the search for great singers to compare with Farinelli or Faustina.

Mr. Paine said: "The principal causes of this degeneracy are easy to trace; first, the rapid development of instrumental music within the last hundred years has exercised a bad influence on the art of singing, by the increased importance that is attached to the instrumental accompaniment. The latest composers are not content with the coloring furnished by the less powerful wind instruments in the orchestra, by the motives, obligato passages and other ornaments which may be introduced to adorn and beautify the music, and intensify the dramatic and lyrical expression of the vocal part, when used with taste and discrimination, but they have overloaded and disfigured their scores by the inordinate and unmeaning blasts of trombones, trumpets and other loud-toned instruments in the midst of the solo part, so that oftentimes the singer strains his voice in vain to be heard above the din of the orchestra. Now what is gained by this? Are the ideas of these masters so grand and significant, so weighty with thought, that they require this constant tension on the resources of the orchestra and singers? But, setting aside this abuse of material, if we turn to more reasonable exhibitions of modern instrumentation, we still find that the singer has been made to depend so absolutely on the instrumental accompaniment as to be of fatal injury to the art of singing. In the great school of the last century, the singers were obliged to rely more on their musical instinct and perception. They practiced their exercises without the aid of any instrument, and were trained to find the pitch without a tuning fork, or any other guide than the inward ear.

Another powerful cause of the decline of the vocal art is owing to the fact of the gradual raising of the musical pitch, which has been growing higher and higher ever since modern instrumental music gained such prominence. The natural compass and range of the human voice had served hitherto as the legitimate guide of pitch; but as soon as solo instrumental performers, or virtuosi, found that their instruments gained a certain brilliancy by higher tuning, even though at the cost of pure resonance of tone, they soon succeeded in effecting a change in the pitch. From observations made by Chladni, Scheibler, Opelt and others it has been decided that the standard of the Royal orchestra at Paris in 1788 had 409 vibrations in a second. Soon after this time the concert pitch began to grow higher, and in this century it has attained a point full a tone and a half higher than in Handel's time. The highest point was reached a few years since at St. Petersburg where the number of vibrations of a exceeded 466 in a second. It was very natural that a reaction from such an unreasonable extreme should take place. At Paris a fixed standard was adopted, which gave the a 435 vibrations in a second. At Berlin, Dresden, Vienna and other leading musical cities of Europe this lower standard has been followed, although the pitch may vary there slightly from the French normal diapason. In Boston, the Music Hall organ is wisely pitched to the French normal diapason, but our orchestral pitch is about three-eighths of a tone higher, or 445 vibrations in a second. This is more than a tone higher than a hundred years ago, when the human voice regulated the musical pitch, as it always should do. The lower standard ought to be introduced everywhere. It is a great error of judgment to suppose that the orchestral instruments, or the organ and piano, sound better at such a high pitch. They may gain a certain brilliancy, but they lose, on the other hand, a good deal of their peculiar individual quality and resonance of tone."

Italy was the home of violin-playing, as of great singers, and the honor was claimed for Archangelo Corelli of being the founder of the higher art of violin-playing. The first Italian violinist of his time was Giuseppe Tartini, born at Pirano in 1692. He was called by his countrymen the "master of the nations." He led a romantic life, and while concealed in a convent he dreamed one night that the Devil appeared to him in person and proceeded to lecture him on his bad performance on the violin, and then showed him how to play some passages whose difficulties had harassed Tartini. The result of this free lesson of his Satanic majesty was the celebrated Devil's Sonata. Germany was hardly behind Italy in the possession of eminent masters of the violin, and German masters of the organ, which still held its prominent place in church music, soon outstripped all others. The French were distinguished as harpsichord players earlier than either the Italians or Germans, and the Couperin family, renowned for their musical gifts, did much toward the cultivation of instrumental music.

The first treatises on Thorough Bass were written early in the 17th century, but it was not until the publication of later works by Rameau and others that the system acquired its modern significance.

The illustrations performed by Mr. Paine on the piano were enthusiastically received, and consisted of a selection from a suite by Couperin; "The Egyptian," a dance movement by Rameau; a sonata from Domenico Scarlatti, and, by special request, a fugue by Alexander Scarlatti.

Biography of Palestrina.

(From the Christian Remembrancer.)

There are few in the present day, especially among those gifted with musical knowledge or taste, who have not heard the name of Palestrina; few, perhaps, who are not in some degree familiar with his works. But while we doubt whether even the musical world are fully aware of the vast debt they owe him for the wondrous reformation which, single handed, he effected in their science, we are not without hope that to the general reader, also, the details of his chequered life may not be unacceptable; that, as an instructive biography, it may at least repay the trouble of a short notice.

The age of Palestrina was that wherein the human mind achieved its first decided step in the march of modern civilization, that which witnessed the outburst of the great reform movement throughout Europe. And we must premise that, among the abuses then so universally prevalent, the state of music was by no means the least. Not to mention the strange effect which must have been produced by the compositions of masters, who enveloped themselves in a maze of theoretical difficulties, while they avowedly and on principle scorned to consult the ear—an effect which one of the cardinals of the day honestly compared to the noise of a pack of young swine—the themes themselves of the sacred compositions were not unfrequently of the most objectionable character. What else can we say of a mass composed upon the subject, and bearing the title of, L'Homme armé, or, as we should phrase it in our own vernacular, "The British Grenadier?" The most loyal admirer of "the glorious land we live in," would hardly choose this for the subject of an anthem. Or, again, what else can be said of the fact, that not loyal only, but loose and dissolute songs were employed for the same purpose; and that, too, with such audacity, as not to discard even the words, which, whether gross or amorous, were sung in the very chapel of the Pope, along with those of prayer and adoration?

Such was the state of things, when, in the summer or autumn of the year 1524, the infant Giovanni Pierluigi, the subject of our memoir, first saw the light in the ancient town of Præneste or Palestrina.

His parents were of humble condition, deriving their chief support from the sale of the produce of their little garden in the Roman market. We have no record left of his early years; but all that we know of his after life leads us to the conclusion, that he was trained from the first in habits of simple, unpretending piety. If it were not too fanciful, we should be inclined to argue, from the name he received at his baptism—the name Pior (or Peter) inserted between the other two of Giovanni and Luigi—that his parents were persons of religious feelings and habits. It would seem to indicate, that in the home of his childhood was reverently cherished the ancient tradition, that on the hill of Præneste St. Peter first preached in Italy the tidings of the Gospel. And this supposition is rendered more probable, by their early dedication of their son to the Church, in the capacity of a chorister. No doubt he had given while yet a child undeniable tokens of the genius which afterwards displayed itself: yet we are loth to suppose, with some editors of his works, that the motives which influenced such a decision were merely mercenary; that the parents of the young Pierluigi were prevailed upon to place him within the walls of the sanctuary by a side glance at the princely forures that were being realized by many of the musical professors of Italy. If such were the case, never did man imbibe less of the spirit of his parents. We shall have occasion to see him, hereafter, clinging to the Church with all the love of a devoted servant and son, at a time when such an attachment might have seemed but to impede his rising fortunes; we shall see him even when in the zenith of his fame, and at the head of the most renowned musical school in Italy, devoting still his chief energies and the chief portion of his time to the service of the Church, while he appeared but occasionally to direct in person the studies of his disciples. Why should we not, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, and with much indirect evidence to confirm our view, suppose him to be one of those young Samuels, such as we wish our choir-boys ever to be, dedicated to the Church from the first in a spirit of devotion and reverence, and perfecting for himself what was thus begun for him by others?

Another circumstance which may have tended to form the character of the young Palestrina was this; that his studies as a youth were pursued under the direction of one who played a conspicuous part in the religious movement of the day. Sent to Rome at the age of sixteen, he was placed under the tuition (as Bainsi his biographer has fully proved from documents), of Claude Goudimel, a Burgundian, whom we afterwards find associated with Clement Marot and Beza, in the arrangement and setting of the psalmody of the Reformers, and who finally suffered for his faith at Lyons, in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Of a master like this, with so strong a religious bias and character, so sincere and real in his convictions, we cannot help supposing that, in addition to the musical skill which he imparted to his scholars, (and he had many who afterwards became famous), he would impart also, to all who were capable of receiving the impression, a thoughtful and religious tone of mind; that the young Pierluigi would at least lose nothing of his early piety in the school of Claude Goudimel. The traces of his hand may yet be recognized in the works of his scholar. There are yet to be seen among the writings of Palestrina, not themes merely with similar treatment, but whole passages transferred note for note from the pages of Goudimel.

We do not, then, mean to claim for our composer originality in the strict sense of the term. We do not mean to assert that he was the founder, but rather the perferer of a school. Like our own Shakespeare, he found his materials for the most part ready to hand; but made them his own by his way of treating them. In their passage through his mind they became invested with the beauty and richness of his genius and fancy. Taking for his foundation the old Church scales, which St. Ambrose was the first to weed out of the impracticable intricacies of the Greek theory of music, and which St. Gregory afterwards reduced to a definite system; and together with them, studying the old Church tunes, which for centuries had been consecrated to the uses of devotion, he developed out of these materials, by the aid of great genius, great science, and a truly devotional spirit, a style of Church music calculated alike, from its grave dignity, to grace the public worship of the sanctuary, and from its noble vigor to express the feeling of each hearty and genuine worshipper.

To those who may be curious to see the process by which Palestrina gradually formed himself, the way in which he was wont to plunge a fine old hymn into the furnace of his mind, and setting it, as it were, red-hot on the anvil, beat out on all sides glorious sparks of harmony, we would recommend the study of such a composition as the "Beatus Laurentius," to be found among the twenty motets of this author, recently published in Paris. The ancient plain chant, or choral song in commemoration of the martyr St. Laurence, is there not only taken as a theme for the melody, but preserved entire amidst the surrounding harmony; the tenors singing it straight through, while the other voices comment upon and illustrate it, by an appropriate and expressive counterpoint. It is in this style of composition that we must refer the origin of the word Motet, practically synonymous with our English word Anthem. The term was meant to describe that "movement," that setting in motion of the plain song of which we have been speaking. It denotes the work of one who, starting with a theme as simple, yet bold and solemn, as may be—continues that theme—and gradually unfolds it, arranging and combining its several details according to certain established laws of harmony, and with a strict regard to unity, so as in no part of the composition to lose sight of the original idea. From such a source, and by such a process, it was that Palestrina imbued his mind with the elevated and severe grandeur which has been remarked as characterizing his style, together with the beautiful and substantial melody which even modern critics admit that he has united to his harmony. A noble thought, grandly developed, and simply yet beautifully clothed—such may stand for a general description of the works of this composer.

It could hardly be that one whose mind contained the germs of such music as this should fail at an early age to attract notice. Accordingly we find him, in his twenty-seventh year, established as choir-master, and soon after as chapel-master, of the Julian Chapel in the Basilica of the Vatican. Up to this time he had no doubt remained under the tuition of Goudimel; for of his first book of masses, published three years afterwards (in 1554), we are told, that they bore marks rather of the pupil than of the master. One remarkable feature in them confirms the account before given of the model on which Palestrina formed his style; namely, that the plain chant is continuously sung by one or other of the parts, accompanied by the rest with an incessantly varied counterpoint. As yet the author had not diverged from the beaten track of his predecessors, in paying the slightest attention to the sense or connection of the words. There is, however, a circumstance connected with the publication of this book, both interesting in itself, and important as giving evidence of the spirit in which it was undertaken, and showing that time only was wanting to enable its author entirely to throw off the trammels with which a bad system had shackled him. In a little frontispiece placed at the foot of this first production, and of which Hawkins has preserved a facsimile, we find the young composer represented in his ecclesiastical garb, offering upon his knees the book which he had just written to Pope Julius III., his patron; and we conclude from this early token, that the aim and employment of Palestrina's life is already settled, that he regards his calling as a sacred one, and has devoted himself once for all to the service of the Church; and we feel that, if the devotional music of his day and country is to be reformed, to him, of all others, we may look for its reformation.

The work, notwithstanding its imperfections, met with great success, so evidently did it surpass all others of the age; and the Pope, by way of recompense, removed the author from his post at the Basilica to the choir of his own chapel. This we may date as the happiest period of Palestrina's life. For one so full of high aspirations to be placed, at the opening of manhood, in a position so eminent; welcomed, encouraged, and promoted by the patron whose approbation he was most anxious to secure; at a time, too, when that patron had leisure as well as inclination to watch over and foster the dawnings of his genius—for Pope Julius, it must be remembered, had now withdrawn from politics, and, in the retirement of his villa, devoted himself to less turbulent and more congenial pursuits—for a young and hitherto unknown composer to be placed on a sudden in circumstances so promising, must naturally have shed a gleam of joy over the present, and of hope over the future. While, to add a further element to this pleasant period of his existence, we find that he changed the single for the married state; and a book of madrigals produced during the same year may be considered as the expression and utterance, in his own sweet language, of his earthly felicity.

At the beginning of the third Act, after the return of the pilgrims, who this time, as they cross the stage, take up the entire religious thema of the overture, Elizabeth kneels before the image of the Madonna, which we saw in the first act, and offers up her last prayer, in which she seems to breathe forth her last sighs for him, whom she has loved so patiently and so forgivingly. The long holding notes of the wind instruments, rendered sombre by the half stifled groaning of the corni di buisnetto, help us to feel her deadly exhaustion. One might almost say that Wagner was unwilling to forget a single stage in this agony of hope, so careful is he to gather up each cry of anguish that escapes from every recollection hovering about her; reviving in the orchestra, as things that must come back in the consciousness of the dying maiden, fragmentary reminiscences of the past, of her intercourse with Tannhäuser, her duet with him in the second act, the prayer that saved his life, the song of Wolfram, when he tried to restore unity among the minstrels and to rescue Tannhäuser from his illusions, &c. * * *

Wolfram alone, after she has withdrawn, turns to the evening star and commissions it to pour out its balm of consolation upon the maiden who will not be comforted. This romance for baritone is one of the most melancholy outbursts of love, and affords one of those moments of repose in which the attention, overstrained and distracted by the action of the drama, can surrender itself entirely to a purely lyrical emotion. But this resting point was indispensably necessary before the finale of the opera, which may be counted among the most astonishing of Wagner's creations. We allude to the scene in which Tannhäuser is recognized by Wolfram and tells him the story of his pilgrimage.

The verses of his narrative are exceedingly fine; but Wagner has found the secret of uniting them with such an admirable correspondence, of so completely blending words and music, that it is impossible on the one hand to let the words pass unobserved so greatly in their clear and intelligible declaration brought out by the musical intonations, or on the other hand to err so far as to consider the music merely a subordinate matter, simply used to make the words more prominent. Wagner is very far from exposing himself to such a calumny, as that which accuses Gluck of a blasphemous speech; to wit that the great master was heard to exclaim, before sitting down to compose: "Great God, grant me grace to forget that I am a musician!" Great musician as he is, Wagner still remains no less distinguished as a poet and prose writer: but however much he may be a poet, he finds only in music the perfect expression of his feeling, and indeed so perfect, that he can tell us, whether he suits his words to his melodies, or whether he seeks melodies for his words. The bitter and cutting narrative, which flows with painful sarcasms from the compressed lips of the desperate excommunicated man, is so heart-rending, that there are some persons who could not endure it to the close. In this multifarious confession, wrrenched from the most fearful anguish, there is a succession of recitative, speech, exclamation, shrieks, sardonic laughter, all mingled with such pathetic truth and such variety of passionate, inconsolable and frantic emotions,—hopes realized or deceived, pity refused to gnawing wounds of conscience, pardon forever impossible to sin repented of in bitter tears, the most pining entreaties rejected, the most glowing remorse spurned, and finally extreme terror as the thought of unavoidable perdition,—that this moment seems itself to form a drama within a drama. By its sombre coloring, by its terrible death-anguish, it is sharply discriminated from what precedes and what follows.

The terrors of this fearful night, whose gloom continually deepens with Tannhäuser's narrative, reach their climax at the recollection of Dame Venus's habitation in the mountains, which opens, to swallow up its prey, while the Goddess shows herself and calls to her victim to draw him back to her. These suggestions of voluptuous pleasures, fanning an unextinguishable flame, while they add their thrilling vibrations to the convulsive plaints of the unhappy man, raise the awful aspect of this moment to the intensest pitch, and impress upon it the most preternatural torments, which the human imagination has embodied in its conception of hell. During this interlude, which offers to the senses only alluring forms, and yet excites our utter terror, since it lends a more poetic truth to the infernal sabbath, where mortals hold intercourse with demons, than the hideous, grotesque and repulsive representations thereof given with equal bad taste by the most different arts,—you hear the Allegro of the overture behind the scenes, as if it sounded from the bowels of the mountain. Tannhäuser, in the extremity of his despair, seeking Venus, with a mournful shriek takes up again the passage in the overture, which there led in the dominant melody, and which now prolongs itself into the orchestra by a shuddering tremolo of violins. This confounding and electric out-gush of voluptuousness is interrupted by deep silence, as Wolfram pronounces the name of Elizabeth, which Tannhäuser in a stupor of amazement repeats. The parti-colored twilight disappears. The mountain closes, and the spectator says to himself: "The earth has him again!"

Just as the funeral procession appears, bearing Elizabeth upon a bier, and the wretched sinner sinks down by the side of her pale corpse with the words: "Holy Elizabeth, pray for me!" and dying there is finally united with the object of his love; just as the long funeral train, headed by the landgrave, and attended by a crowd of priests, knights and noble ladies, fills the whole scene with a dense mass, making it resound with dirges, accompanied with the muffled toll of bells,—just then the sun comes up over the arrow-clouded valley. At this very instant all, as at a visible sign that the eternal light has glorified the two lovers, strike up a tremendous chorus to the first eight bars of the religious theme of the overture, a "Hallelujah! he is redeemed! Hallelujah!" with which a group of pilgrims, who have just come from Rome, bearing the news of the miracle of salvation, announced to the implacable bishop by the blooming of his staff, unite their voices. This Hallelujah, by its holy unction, by its glory-radiating splendor of joy, gives us confidence and hope again and lets us revel as it were in heavenly refreshment.

The two lovers, whose fate we have followed with such intense anxiety, have ceased to live. Excess of suffering has killed them both. Yet, no sooner has this great drama ended, passed before our eyes, and become an image in our memory, a shudder in our heart, than our soul is comforted and again cheered up; the wounds it gave us are healed, the pains it occasioned us are quieted. We believe that the noble and long-suffering bridal pair have arrived in a safe haven. We believe them happy. We believe them surrounded by an incorruptible, unfading and immortal bliss. He has heard the last prayer of Elizabeth, so full of humility and love: could he not in this hearing find for her the triumph and beatitude? At the sight of this soiled destiny, trailed like a broken reed upon the earth, but blooming again, like a radiant lily, in the skies, we clearly feel how the erring may be saved, so mighty is the power of religious exaltation contained in the finale, which forms the epilogue to the opera. To lead the minds of a frivolous public thus, by means of a commanding power of Art, beyond its ordinary bounds of fancy:—to make it thus experience the feeling of true joy springing out of actual sorrow, through the transporting power of spirituality and the highest longing of our nature:—is not this one of the most beautiful and glorious victories for which poets and artists are privileged to strive!

Music Abroad.

London.

COMING EVENTS.—The Musical World (Jan. 28) announces the following:

First of all, there is the prospectus of the Oratorio Concerts, which are to enter upon their third season on the morrow of St. Valentine. The directors have already accustomed us to look for novelty in their schemes; indeed, enterprise, as distinguished from routine, was the mot d'ordre under the inspiration of which they started on their way. Right well have they kept to it thus far: and now let us glance at promises for the immediate future. Of works never yet given at these Concerts there are to be performed Benedict's St. Peter, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's Nala and Damayanti, Handel's Israel in Egypt, and Tenth Chant Anthem; a new composition, "chiefly orchestral," by Mr. Joseph Barnby, and a De Profundis by M. Charles Gounod. Here is, indeed, a goodly lot; for, although Israel in Egypt has become familiar, enough remains to satisfy the loudest clamor for that which is strange. The selection of a Chant Anthem is very welcome, as a partial set-off against the long neglect endured by those fine compositions. We wish, however, the promise were not coupled with that of "additional accompaniments," because, when an unfamiliar view of Handel is afforded, the old master should be shown alone, and not flatteringly united to an inferior being. Interest will, of course, be excited by Mr. Barnby's work, as that of a clever and aspiring musician; while that of M. Gounod, much of whose strength lies in church composition, is sure to be eagerly anticipated. No more need be said about a prospectus which advocates its own cause sufficiently well, except to point out that Bach's Matthew Passion is down for repetition. By-and-by, perhaps, when the English public have had this glorious work sufficiently crammed into their heads, they will begin to like it.

Our next prospectus is that of Mr. Henry Leslie, who announces for his sixteenth season three concerts of unaccompanied music, and a performance of his own oratorio, Immanuel. Each of the former, we are glad to observe, has a distinct individuality, and is not a mere chance collection of odds and ends. Thus the opening programme is devoted to the works of English composers, from old Thomas Weelkes down to young Arthur Sullivan, from which a capital selection has been made. Concert the second is dignified with the title "Historical, and illustrates the music of 280 years—from 1600 to 1780—the less known composers laid under contribution being Carissimi, Frescobaldi, Lulli, and Stradella. Concert the third is devoted to sacred music, including some movements from Gounod's second Mass for male voices; and, as regards Immanuel, it will be enough to say that "several important alterations have been made since its previous performances in London." On the whole, Mr. Leslie's season will turn out not less interesting than the best of its predecessors.

Mr. Henry Holmes announces the fourth series of his Concerts of Chamber Music, in which he will be assisted by Mr. F. Folkes (second violin), Mr. Burnett and Mr. Hann (violins), Signor Pesse (violinello), Mr. Shedlock (pianist), and a variety of singers. The works announced for performance are all of acknowledged merit or unquestionable interest, for which the following names and the number of times they occur are guarantee:—Beethoven, four times; Mozart, twice; Haydn, once; Schumann, twice; Schubert, once; Mendelssohn, twice; and Brahms, once. On all accounts we wish well to Mr. Holmes and his laudable enterprise—which, by the way, was successfully "inaugurated" at St. George's Hall, on Thursday evening.

BEETHOVEN AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE. (From the same):

The series of twelve concerts given before Christmas at the Crystal Palace was the most remarkable since the institution of these excellent and thoroughly healthy entertainments. Mr. Mann kept his promise strictly with regard to Beethoven, whose name was conspicuously prominent in every one of the twelve programmes. How it was intended to do honor to the immortal musician on the occasion of the centenary of his birth need not be repeated. A brief recapitulation of what was done will therefore suffice.

At the first concert Beethoven was represented by the symphony in C (No. 1), and the pianoforte concerto in G (No. 4)—played by Mr. Charles Hallé; at the second, by the symphony in D (No. 2); at the third, by the overture to Prometheus and the symphony in E flat (the "Eroica"—No. 3); at the fourth, by the symphony in B flat (No. 4), and the pianoforte concerto in C minor (No. 5)—played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann; at the fifth, by the four overtures composed at various times for the opera of Fidelio, the three in C in a group at the beginning, the fourth, in E, at the end of the concert (a very proper arrangement, the fourth possessing nothing in common with any of the others), and the symphony in C minor (No. 6); at the sixth, by the great overture in C, called the "Weide des Hauses," and the Mass in C (No. 1); at the seventh, by the symphony in F (the "Pastoral"—No. 6), and the pianoforte concerto, No. 2 (in B flat)—played by Mr. Franklin Taylor; at the eighth, by the symphony in A (No. 7), and the pianoforte concerto in E flat (No. 5), the last and greatest of the series—played by Mme. Arabella Goddard; at the ninth, by the overture and incidental music to the Ruins of Athens, and the violin concerto in D (the only one composed by Beethoven)—played by Mme. Norman Neruda; at the tenth, by the symphony in F (No. 8), the overture written for Goethe's tragedy of Egmont, the pianoforte concerto in C (No. 1), played by Herr Pauer, and the beautiful cycle of songs, six in one, entitled "Liederkreis," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves (accompanied by Mr. Arthur Sullivan); at the eleventh, by the septet for string and wind instruments,—the string parts being played, as at the Paris Conservatoire, by the whole string orchestra,—and the overture written for Collin's tragedy of Coriolan.

At the twelfth and last concert of the series, which took place on Saturday, Dec. 17th, Beethoven's birthday, the entire programme was devoted to his music, vocal and instrumental. To this concert might fairly have been adjudged as motto, Finis coronat opus. A more varied and attractive selection could hardly be imagined. It began with the overture to the ballet of Prometheus, composed at Vienna in 1800, and ended with that musical colossus, the Ninth Symphony (with chorus), composed in 1822–3, also at Vienna, where, notwithstanding that it was originally intended for the London Philharmonic Society, which had bought and paid for it (£50!), it was also first performed, on March 21st, 1825. Thus we had the great musician both in the vigor of his early manhood and at the glorious close of his career; for the symphony was the last great orchestral piece of Beethoven, and, five string quartets excepted, his last great work. The compositions which separated the overture from the symphony in this really memorable concert were specimens derived from various periods of Beethoven's intermediate career. First, there was one of the arrangements of national air, made for George Thomson of Edinburgh. The air selected was "Sweet power of song," words by Joanna Baillie (still better known as one of Moore's Irish Melodies—"Rich and rare were the gems she wore"). Beethoven has arranged this for two voices, with accompaniments for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The singers on the occasion under notice were Miss Ellen Horne and Julia Elton, the string parts were given by four violins and four violoncellos in the orchestra, and the pianoforte accompaniment was entrusted to Mr. Beringer. To this succeeded the well-known "Adelaide" [1796], sung by Mr. Vernon Rigby and accompanied on the piano by Mme. Arabella Goddard; after which came the (to amateurs) scarcely less familiar Choral Fantasia [1808], the pianoforte solo by Mme. Goddard, the full choral parts being sung by the Crystal Palace Choir, which Mr. Manns has been some time training with such diligence and care, and, to judge by this display, with such excellent results. Then came the ballad of Mignon, "Kennst du das Land?" coupled with "Herr, mein Herr"—both to Goethe's text [1810], sung by Herr Stockhausen, to the accompaniment of Mr. Franklin Taylor; and then the four melodies which Beethoven wedded to the same poet's little stanzas, called "Sehnsucht" [1806–10]—sung by Miss Arabella Smythe. The Thirty-two variations in C minor on the original Theme, for pianoforte solo [1807], the first of two pieces unique in their way, in regard to the form of which Beethoven, in all probability, was more or less influenced by J. S. Bach's Chaconne, with variations, for the violin, followed next,—Mme. Goddard again being the pianist.

These were the pieces which divided the Prometheus overture from the Ninth Symphony: and every one of them had a value of its own. The concert was nearly half longer in duration than almost any other concert we can remember at the Crystal Palace; but all the artists engaged in it did their very best. There was not an instant of dullness; and what, so far as the orchestra and chorus were concerned, was a magnificent rendering of the greatest of symphonies brought to a fitting climax a performance in every way worthy to commemorate such an occasion as the hundredth anniversary of the birthday of the greatest of all musicians. Never did Mr. Manns bring more enthusiasm to his task, and never did he more richly merit the unanimous applause which greeted him when that task had been accomplished.

The twelve concerts thus terminated, it should be understood, contained many more things which, under other circumstances, would have claimed special notice; but the chief point of interest was in Beethoven; and to Beethoven, on that account, our remarks have been confined. For a time, owing to the Christmas festivities, the Saturday Concerts were, as usual, suspended; but they are happily to be resumed this very afternoon—with a programme, by the way, which does not contain a single piece by Beethoven, either vocal or instrumental.

MONDAY POPULAR.—CRYSTAL PALACE.—MME. SCHUMANN. The Orchestra of Feb. 3, tells us:

The second appearance of Mme. Szarvady made the last Monday Popular Concert as memorable as its predecessor. Associated with Mme. Norman Neruda upon a work like Mendelssohn's Quartet in B major, it may be understood how exquisitely she brought forth results of the finest musical art. The taste and precision given to this performance were of the highest order. The composition is one which—early and immature work of its author as it is—yet calls forth great and varied talents in its interpretation. Brilliance, and sympathy, and tenderness, and exactitude, all are needful, and these qualities are amply supplied by the great pianist whom patrons of music best remember under her name of Wilhelmina Claus. In Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" she was only less successful, through having entered on debatable ground. Schumann's recognition is still only partially effected, notwithstanding the skill and persistency of his wife and the energy of his admirers. Mozart's Sonata in F major was a more unexceptionable triumph for the lady, and here she and her coadjutor, Mme. Neruda, enjoyed the victory undisputed. This indeed was the best applauded morceau of the programme. Haydn's D minor Quartet closed the concert, which had been diversified by the singing of Herr Stockhausen.

Last week the programme of the Monday Popular Concert ran as follows:

Quartet in A minor, Op. 29.....Schubert.
Cavatina from "La Fete du Village".....Boieldieu.
Fantasia in F sharp minor.....Mendelssohn.
Prelude, Allemande, and Courante in D, for 'cello.....Bach.
Songs.....Schumann.
Trio in C minor, Op. 1.....Beethoven.

The quartet of Schubert's—his fifteenth—is eminently characteristic of his style; and its airy beauty and delicate charm render it ever popular with these audiences. Mme. Norman Neruda was again the leading violinist, Miss Agnes Zimmermann the pianist, and Herr Stockhausen the vocalist. The execution of the second lady in Mendelssohn's Fantasia was as easy and brilliant as usual, and her reception proportionate.

The Monday Popular Concert of this week had for its chief feature the rentrée of Mme. Schumann, who was warmly acclaimed. She soon exhibited the possession of undiminished powers in the fire and facility of her rendering of Schubert's A minor Sonata. The various movements were followed with unflinching attention, and prolonged applause greeted the end of the intellectual treat. In Beethoven's duet sonata in C minor for pianoforte and violin, she had the advantage of Mme. Norman-Neruda's co-operation, and the result was a noble execution on both sides. The quartets were Mendelssohn's in E flat and Haydn's in G: executants as before. The songs were "Per la gloria" by Buononcini (Handel's rival), and Schumann's "Nur-tree," the latter accompanied by Mme. Schumann to Herr Stockhausen's singing.

The resumption of the Saturday Afternoon Concerts at the Crystal Palace was characterized by the following programme:
Overture, "Medea".....Cherubini.
Aria, "Non mi dir" [Don Giovanni]; Mlle. Corani-Mosart.
Symphony in B minor.....Schubert.
Aria, "Per la gloria" Herr Stockhausen.....Buononcini.
Violin Concerto; Mme. Norman-Neruda.....Mendelssohn.
Canon, "Marinella"; Mlle. Corani.....Rasdeger.
Aria, "Non piu andrai" ["Nusse di Figaro"]; Herr Stockhausen.
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini.

Schubert's unfinished symphony is a fragment which induces regret that it should never have been finished, so exquisite is it in its passionate melancholy, and its melodic grace. It was admirably executed. The violin concerto of Mendelssohn, having Mme. Norman Neruda for an interpreter, was in the best hands. Mlle. Corani sang very effectively.

The first of Mme. Schumann's Recitals took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, when a large audience, attracted by her celebrity, attended. The programme, which was varied and full of interest, opened with Beethoven's Grand Sonata in E flat, a work which displayed at the fullest Mme. Schumann's highest range of powers. Her delicate tone and dainty touch in the scherzo and minuet, and the force and energy of the final presto, were points of excellence which alone sufficed to prove her a consummate artist and brilliant performer. Two characteristic morceaux by Mendelssohn and Brahms succeeded, and then the gifted pianist played Sebastian Bach's fine Italian concerto, in which the phraseology of the master found an interpreter quite as apt and skilful as she proved herself in the more striking grandeur of Beethoven. The rest of the programme consisted of one of Mendelssohn's fine pianoforte preludes in E minor; a sweet and eminently characteristic "nocturne" by Chopin; and a very impassioned brilliant "impromptu" by the same composer. Mme. Schumann maintained the power of this very trying performance, as well as the interest of her admiring listeners, to the last, and was frequently rewarded by well-earned and enthusiastic plaudits. Herr Stockhausen was the vocalist.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 25, 1871.

OUR MUSIC PAGES.—Having completed Mendelssohn's "Elijah," we have now begun to give our readers, in fortnightly instalments, the whole of Messrs. Dison & Co.'s carefully edited and beautiful edition of SEBASTIAN BACH's incomparable "PASSION MUSIC ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL OF ST. MATTHEW," as arranged for voices with piano-forte by Julius Stern, but with the substitution of the admirable arrangement by Robert Franz in most of the solo Arias, and with English text as close as could be made both to the music and to the sense and style of the original German, which is also given. The Translator's Preface, in our number before the last, will explain in what sense and spirit this was done.

When we have printed enough pages of it to afford specimens of its various forms of composition (double and single choruses, chorales, recitatives, arias, &c.), we shall try to give a descriptive analysis of the immortal work. The music is very difficult, and as far as possible from "popular;" but it is destined to sink deeply into earnestly musical and pious hearts. This is already proved here, as abroad, by the impression made by the Arias that have been sung in our Symphony Concerts, and by the deep love, and the desire for more of it, which those portions that were studied last winter by the Handel & Haydn Society inspired in the hearts of two or three hundred singers. This interest will deepen and extend when the Society performs a large selection from it during their Festival next May; and we have no doubt that a public presentation of the whole work will be demanded of more than one Oratorio Society before two years have passed.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The seventh Symphony Concert (Feb. 9) had the usual large and deeply interested audience, who all sat and listened as if unwilling to lose a note of the choice programme:

f Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann.
Piano-forte Concerto, No. 2, in F minor, Op. 21.....Chopin.
Maestoso. Larghetto. Allegro vivace.

Hugo Leonhard.
Fantasia-Overture to Moore's "Paradise and the Peri," Op. 42.....Wm. Sterndale Bennett.
Introduction. "One morn a Peri at the gate
Of Eden stood, disconsolate."

Choral. "Morgenglanz der Ewigkeit."

Scene I. "While thus she mus'd, her pinions fann'd
The air of that sweet Indian land,
Whose air is balm; whose ocean spreads
O'er coral rocks and amber beds."

Scene II. "Her first fond hope of Eden blighted,
Now among Afric's lunar Mountains,
Far to the South, the Peri lighted."

Scene III. "But nought can charm the luckless Peri;
Her soul is sad—her wings are weary.
Yet haply there may lie conceal'd
Beneath those Chambers of the Sun,
The erring Spirit that restores so soon
An erring Spirit to the skies!"

Symphony, No. 3, in E flat.....Schumann.
Vivace. Scherzo. Andante. Religioso, (suggested by a religious ceremonial in the Cologne Cathedral).
Allegro.

This programme was choice,—one of the richest, most unique, consistent, satisfying of the season, although it did not seem to suit the mood of newspaper criticism quite so well as usual. But, leaving Beethoven programmes out of the question, what have we had, or can we have, much better? Stress has been laid upon the work by Bennett as the only piece new to Boston, and more words used to show that it is not "great," than are vouchsafed to all the rest of the selections. There was no need that it should be great; in the midst of three great standard works it was introduced as a pleasing bit of variety and novelty, a delicate, refined, poetic, charming piece of instrumental art, albeit with no more of originality or decided force of genius in it than one is wont to expect from the gentle, graceful muse of the composer of the "Naiads" and the "Wood Nymph" Overtures. It has an exquisite theme pervading it, and the instrumental coloring is full of charm.

Much briefer, and in the closer, rounded form of an Overture proper, that to "Genoveva," by Schumann, to say the least, wears well, and never was enjoyed with keener zest than on this its sixth hearing here, for it has figured once in every season of these concerts. The oftener it is heard, the more is it recognized as one of the very best of Overtures. It is a true creation, one of those living forms that come out whole and perfect at a single cast. Romantic, somewhat mystical, deep in feeling, full of recondite and subtle graces, yet vigorous and wholesome, with the breath of the woods in it, and ringing jubilee of horns borne in upon fresh breezes to revive the spirits ere they droop with excess of sentiment or cloying beauty,—and yet all this unforced, unmanaged, true as life and nature—this Overture is one of the happiest and most characteristic instances of Schumann's genius and can never be unwelcome to a musically cultivated public.

Then it must be borne in mind, that this was in some sense the Schumann Concert, he taking his turn as symphonist among the great ones after Beethoven. The "well-known" Cologne Symphony (as some of our aforesaid critics called it, dismissing it with a word, as if it were too common an affair to lend any significance to a concert) had been heard just twice before in Boston (and that was two years ago);—twice and no more, except by those more earnest music-lovers who attend rehearsals, and who seek, by every possible hearing as well as by private study through four-hand arrangements, &c. to really become acquainted with these formidable master-works; but in this class how many of the gentlemen, who issue their critical dicta with such crank assurance after every concert in the newspapers, can be counted, think you?

Is it a rash surmise, that (say) a third part of the constant attendants of these concerts have taken pains to study in some way the symphonies, overtures, concertos, &c., set down for performance, and thereby prepare themselves to listen in the right spirit, and with understanding? And if so, are not all of these more competent to pass a judgment whether on the composition or performance, than some of the professional "authorities" who have not prepared themselves at all? But we do wrong to some of them to charge them with assurance; rather is it the want of assurance, the want of any positive perception or conviction on which true assurance can be based, that leads so many to assume the assured tone, as if in duty to the dignity of their position, and in a bewildered and uncertain state of mind, with no opinion in them, no impression which they trust a few hours afterward (unless confirmed by more assured ones who speak first), yet to pronounce an opinion, as if ex cathedra, feebly echoing the stronger speaker, or else evade the issue in a cloud of generalities about the concert, leaving nothing said of that which was most worthy of remark.

In the rendering of this "Cologne" (or "Rhenish") Symphony the Orchestra did themselves great credit. The broad syncopated rhythm of the first movement, full and majestic, like a full-freighted noble vessel bearing down upon a noble river; the quaint, original Volklied, or vintagers' song, as it were, of the Scherzo, its swinging dance yielding to a moment of thoughtful sentiment, and then renewed with alternation of fine freaks of humor between various sets of instruments; the tender, quiet beauty of the Andante, a sort of song without words; the solemn pomp and mystery of that vision of high mass in the Cathedral; the glorious relief and freedom of the finale, with its frolic allusions to odd features in the solemn scene before,—all came out clear and vivid. The two Overtures likewise were finely played, the wind instruments being particularly true and delicate in the Bennett music.

We wish we could say as much of the accompaniment to the Chopin Concerto; but much of that was coarse and over-loud; owing doubtless to the want of time for sufficiently nice rehearsal of such things. Mr. LEONHARD gave a most masterly and finished rendering of the piano part, in all respects worthy of a musician of such fine intelligence and insight, so accomplished as a pianist, so conscientious and thorough in his preparation. As a writer in the Advertiser truly says (protesting against a disparaging and unjust criticism which had appeared there), "he presented the Concerto to the public polished and rounded like a perfect pearl, no smallest shade or detail of meaning being neglected." Mr. Leonhard, like some other artists of a fine poetic temper, may not possess all the modern piano virtuoso's power of making every note tell upon the physical ear of every person in a vast audience; but his technique was so fine as not to escape the recognition of his disparagers, while in point of feeling and interpretation, we doubt not, nearly every appreciative listener in that audience agrees with us, that this rendering was equal to the best of this or any Concerto we have heard in Boston. In the words of the writer above quoted: "He, and his friends for him, have a right to complain of the hasty and unthinking verdict of those who have no standard of musical culture and judgment by which to measure the merits of his excellent performance."

In this week's concert (too late for notice now) Gade furnished the Symphony (C minor, No. 1); the Overtures were Cherubini's to 'Medea,' and Schumann's to 'Manfred,' followed by a lovely little Entr'acte from the same, entirely new here; and for finale, the Orchestral Suite, in C, by Raff, which is all but new.

For the ninth and last but one of the Symphony Concerts (March 9) the programme offers: Part I. Overture to "Medea" by Bargiel (first time); Alto Aria: "Grief and Pain" from Bach's Passion Music (sung, first time in Boston, by Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING); "Tasso" (Symphonic Poem) by Liszt (first time).—Part II. The happy little Symphony in G, (No. 13) by Haydn, which was so much relished a few years ago; Songs, by Miss Sterling; Overture to "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn. The non-arrival of the score and parts to the Schubert-Joachim Symphony, which have been copied in Vienna for these concerts, has compelled this change of programme. The series will end, March 23, with another Beethoven Concert, Miss Krebs playing the E flat Concerto.

Mr. B. J. LANG, in his last concert at the Globe Theatre, gave the following programme:

Quartet, No. 67.....Haydn.
Capriccio in E major, Op. 23.....Sterndale Bennett.
Pianoforte Solo, "Benediction de Dieu dans la Solitude."
Liszt.
Trio in B flat major, Op. 97, for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello.....Beethoven.

The cool, fresh, cheerful Quartet of Father Haydn, —a sincere and thoroughly ripe, artistic kind of music, which grows more refreshing as one gets to be more blasé to the modern strappings for effect,—was nicely rendered by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The Capriccio by Bennett, a volatile, light, graceful thing, was reproduced accordingly, with utmost ease and nicety, by Mr. LANG, with accompaniment of string quartet and flute (which did not always sound so well) to represent, as we presume, the orchestra.

The "Bénédiction, &c.," by Liszt, quite an elaborate piano solo, is in some respects an interesting composition, earnest in intention, with several distinct themes and movements, clothed in rich harmony, suffused with a warm halo of sentiment; but we could not help feeling that, after all, it was too like affected sentiment, and that the momentary inspiration had all faded out before the end. Mr. Lang played it, however, con amore and devoutly, with much expression, and had the close (no doubt with many the sympathetic) attention of the audience throughout. The glorious old king of Trios, the Beethoven in B flat, went finely, and could not fail to be inspiring.

Next Thursday, for his fourth and last Concert, Mr. Lang offers; Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat minor; Concerto in C, by Bach, for three pianos (Messrs. LEONARD and PARKER cooperating); some Piano pieces not yet named; and the Mendelssohn Concerto in D minor.

MISS KELLOGG's concerts, in the Music Hall, Feb. 9th, 10th and 11th, were without orchestra, of the kind called miscellaneous, and mostly hacknied in the selections. But they exhibited the lady and her singing to much better advantage, than any appearance she had made here for some years. The very general criticism the self-conscious and affected manner which she had acquired seems to have been taken to heart truly, and she is now more modest and subdued and simple. Her singing, too, though it was mostly of the ballad kind, indulging less in the bravura which was once her forte, sounds more sincere and real, and has a riper, richer, larger character.

Of her associate artists, Sig. VERONI (whose English accent is native and to the manor born), has a pure, at times sweet tenor, but a little dry, with a fair style; and Sig. RANDOLFI (a manifest German), with a hearty, manly air and bearing, has a hearty baritone that corresponds, and sings such pieces as Stigelli's "Tear" quite admirably. The three voices blended finely in the Trio by Gordigiani: "Vieni al mar."

MR. JAMES M. WEHLI played the same sort of Piano-forte Fantasias on "Martha," "Sweet Home," &c., in the same old way, with wonderful perfection and brilliancy of mechanism;—always his own compositions or compoundings. He seems to keep on hand an assortment of scale exercises, runs, arpeggios, and pyrotechnic figures, wheels, &c., all practiced, polished to perfection, and in these he sets whatever well worn melody he chooses for a theme. The theme may vary, but development there is none, and the firework accompaniment always about the same.

NEXT IN ORDER.—Mr. CARL GLOGGNER-CASTELLI, late Professor of Singing at the Leipzig Conservatory, will give a couple of Matinees at Brackett's Hall, on the afternoons of March 1 and 15. Besides his own vocal contributions (and he is a ripe and finished artist) there will be piano solos by Mr. EDWIN J. BUTLER, and violin solos by Mr. F. F. FORD, both graduates of the Leipzig school.

The programme prepared for the concert to be given on Sunday evening the 5th proximo, in aid of the Relief Fund of the Boston Musicians' Union, contains much excellent matter, and nothing that is uninteresting. Besides the large orchestral force, the Orpheus Musical Society will appear, and there will be vocal performances by Mrs. J. W. Weston, Mrs. Houston-West and Mr. M. W. Whitney. It is a long while since the society made an appeal to the public, and as that public may not understand the object to be aided, it may be well to state that the Relief Fund is established for the aid of sick or disabled musicians, and for other charitable purposes, on the principle of Masonic institutions.—Gazette.

Thomas E. Chickering.

The shafts of death have fallen frequently and suddenly of late among the bearers of respected names in our community. And it is not a little singular that in the same week died the heads of the two great rival piano forte manufacturing houses in America: the elder Steinway, and the subject of this brief notice. Col. Chickering, the oldest of three brothers, who have so successfully continued the noble business built up by their father, and who all of them inherit likewise the sterling, generous traits which made him beloved of all, was called away (by sudden apopleptic stroke) in the prime of manhood almost, having lived but seven and forty years. His winning, amiable disposition from his childhood made him many friends. He had served a thorough practical apprenticeship in his business, having, first, and last, with his own hands made every part of a piano. His sympathies were large, so that he found time for zealous participation in musical, military, charitable and social enterprises. He had been president of the Handel and Haydn Society, Commander of the "Ancient and Honorable," and during the war did honorable service at the head of a regiment, for which he was brevetted General. He was modest, manly, kindly, gentlemanly and true. To all, in all conditions, his words and manner were those of a friend. We can say nothing better, nothing truer of him, than what has been said in all the public journals; for instance this in the Gazette: "His presence was a sunbeam to his family, his friends, his business associates and his employees. No man ever told him a tale of distress and left him empty-handed. No institution, enterprise, or public project of any merit was ever explained to him without gaining his cordial personal and pecuniary co-operation. Under the pressure of whatever trying circumstance, he was always the high-toned, courteous, affable gentleman. He had been engaged in the prosecution of many public measures, had commanded many men, had mixed with many classes, but he has left not a man or woman behind him who cherishes an unkind thought for 'Tom Chickering.'"

The funeral of the late Thomas E. Chickering took place in Trinity Church, Summer street, Saturday forenoon, beginning at eleven o'clock. Members of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, to the number of fifty, the Third Cavalry Association, fifty members, and about fifty members of Post 15, G. A. R., occupied the right body of the church, the centre pews on the right being reserved for the relatives and friends of the deceased. The workmen in the employ of the Messrs. Chickering, to the number of 390, filled the entire left of the body of the church. The members of the pianoforte and organ manufacturing and the music publishing trade were also seated on the right. The right hand gallery was filled by the Handel and Haydn Society, and in the choir gallery was seated a volunteer select choir, consisting of the following named singers, under charge of Mr. J. C. D. Parker, the organist of the church: Mrs. Smith, Miss Gates, Mrs. Gilbert, Miss Osborn and Miss Fuller, sopranos; Mrs. Barry, Mrs. Wadleigh, Mrs. Shattuck, Mr. Tufts and Mrs. Winch, altos; Dr. Langmaid, Dr. Stickney, Mr. Merrill and Mr. Winch, tenors; and Messrs. Whitney, Winch, Sprague, Pazoit and Powers, basses—the gentlemen named forming the Chickering club. The left gallery was thrown open to the public at large. The coffin was borne into the church preceded by Bishop Eastburn, repeating the opening portion of the burial service, the Rev. Phillips Brooks, and the following gentlemen who acted as pall bearers: General F. W. Palfrey, Colonel Henry C. Brooks, Dr. J. B. Upham, Mr. Henry A. Green, Mr. Henry Saltonstall, Mr. Oliver Ditson, Colonel F. G. Pope, Major George S. Worcester.

The services began with a chant by the choir: "Lord, let me know my end"—rendered antiphonally. The lesson was read by the Rev. Phillips Brooks, and the hymn: "Hear what the voice from heaven declares," was sung by the choir. The sentences were then read by Bishop Eastburn, and the committal was recited by Mr. Brooks. The Chickering Club, unaccompanied, next sang: "I heard a voice from heaven," composed by Mr. J. C. D. Parker. At the close of the services, the Handel and Haydn Society, conducted by Carl Zerrahn, sang the choral from Elijah: "Cast thy burden on the Lord," with the addition of the two verses which were sung by them in Music Hall at the time the Hon. Charles Sumner delivered his oration on Abraham Lincoln. After the singing an opportunity was given to view the body, and the large assembly passed out of the church. The funeral cortage then moved to Mount Auburn, where the remains were deposited in the family tomb.—Adv.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 17.—The third Philharmonic concert of the season took place on the 4th inst., with this programme:

Symphony, No. 5, in D major.....Mozart.
Requiem and Romanza (bass clarinet).....Bergmann.
Mr. E. Boehm.
Overture, "Sakuntala" (by request).....Goldmark.
Serenade for four violoncellos.....Lachner.
F. Bergner, C. Bergmann, A. Hoch, A. Leisegang.
Overture, scherzo et finale, Op. 62.....Schumann.

The programme was the most unsatisfactory that the society has given this season. The orchestral pieces were admirably performed. Mr. Boehm played fairly, though the instrument is one that should never be heard except in an orchestra. The accompaniment is arranged for two clarionets and two bassoons. The quartet for four violoncellos was played finely and was encored by the audience, which was the smallest that has attended a Philharmonic concert for many seasons. For the next concert, to take place on March 4th, a new overture "Aladdin," by Reinecke, and Schumann's Cologne symphony are promised. The soloists are not yet announced.

Miss Krebs's pianoforte recital, on the 4th, had the following programme:

Sonata, op. 53.....Beethoven.
Miss Krebs.
Aria.....Mendelssohn.
Miss Clotilde Saar.
Fugue, A minor.....J. S. Bach.
"Warum?".....Schumann.
Toccata....."
Miss Krebs.
Rondo for two pianos.....Chopin.
Miss Krebs and Mr. Mills.
"L'Estat d'amore," Waltz.....L. Badia.
Miss Clotilde Saar.
Don Juan. Fantasia.....Liszt.
Miss Krebs.

These concerts are becoming exceedingly popular here, and scores of persons were unable to obtain admission. They are to be repeated until further notice. Miss Krebs plays the entire programme from memory. Her execution is almost faultless, and she plays with fervor. At the concert on the 11th she was assisted by Carl Bergner (violinist). The sixth takes place on the 18th. She will be assisted by Miss Henrietta Beebe (soprano), Signor A. Randolph (baritone), Mr. S. B. Mills (pianist) and Mr. L. Duchauer.

Mr. James M. Wehli commenced a series of pianoforte recitals at Booth's theatre yesterday. The programmes are not as classical as those of Miss Krebs. [Indeed?]

The 3rd Euterpe concert took place on the same day at Association Hall, before the largest audience that has yet greeted them. The programme, as will be seen, was very attractive and varied. It was as follows:

Andante and Allegro, two movements from Symphony No. 2.....Norb. Burgmüller.
Allegro for Concerto in E minor.....Chopin.
Mr. S. B. Mills.
Walpurgis Night.....Mendelssohn.

Miss Ida Rosenburg also sang an aria in the first part. Mr. Mills played in his usual admirable style. The "Walpurgis Night" was well performed, but the chorus and orchestra were far too few for such a work, the chorus numbering about fifty and the orchestra thirty, under the direction of Mr. John P. Morgan. The concert is to be repeated in Brooklyn.

On Wednesday there was a concert at Steinway Hall for the benefit of the Strasbourg sufferers, in which all the leading artists here assisted.

The Glee and Madrigal Society will give a concert to-night at Steinway Hall, for the benefit of the Samaritan home. A concert also takes place at Association Hall, on Saturday, in which Mme. Anna Bishop, Mr. James M. Wehli, the Mendelssohn Union and other artists appear. There is also the usual Saturday afternoon concert at the same hall. For coming concerts we have Church Music Association concert (Feb. 21), Philharmonic Concert (March 4), and an innumerable number of miscellaneous concerts, and "Il Trovatore" at the Academy on Monday, for the benefit of the Samaritan Home.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The programme of the Philharmonic Concert on the 28th embraced Schubert's great symphony in C major, Spohr's overture to "Jessonda," Lindpaintner's "Guerrero" overture, a recitative and romanza composed by Mr. Bergner for bass clarinet, with accompaniment of reed quartet, and two songs by Madame Gazzaniga. Here were only two novelties—the Lindpaintner overture, which has "God save the king" for its theme, and Mr. Bergmann's study of reed effects, which seems to have been generally liked. The Schubert Symphony was caviare to the vulgar; most of the critics of the daily press found it tedious, and several of them pronounced it weak—thut extraordinary work which Robert Schumann called the greatest since Beethoven!—Independent.

PLYMOUTH ORGAN CONCERTS.—An inopportune snow storm did not prevent a very full attendance at the concert on Saturday, thus testifying to the high esteem in which both Mr. Bristow and Miss Sterling, the artists of the occasion, are held by the public. This was Mr. Bristow's first introduction to the great organ, whose thorough acquaintance is more difficult to obtain than that of an Englishman, or a Beacon street Bostonian. But Mr. Bristow speedily overcame its difficulties and rendered a programme full of choice and brilliant selections. The Bach Pastorale was full of intricate harmonies, and, with the exception of the andante, head [!] rather than heart music. The andante from a Mozart Sonata was a delicious bit of heart music, showing that Mozart was rather a follower of Emanuel Bach [!] than of the great Sebastian, if Mozart can be considered as the imitator of any one. The Cathedral Fugue of Attwood, whose compositions are too seldom played, was a grand bit of harmony, massive in some measures, and very warmly appreciated. The "Egmont," "Semiramide," and "Stradella" overtures were given with special brilliancy, and with a very close reproduction of the orchestral effects with which Mr. Bristow, as a prominent member of both Philharmonic orchestras, is familiar.

Miss Sterling chose for her performance the tender aria from Bach's Passion: "Grief and Pain," which she sang with fervor. We have no contralto who can so well interpret these great works; nor does there appear to be any one who cares or dares to undertake the mission of introducing the people to music of this school. It does not tickle the popular taste, but it nevertheless serves to educate and raise it above being satisfied with melodies of the "Shoo-fly" grade. Her second selection, a Canzonetta of Mozart, was splendidly given and received with hearty demonstrations of enjoyment. So also was the beautiful song of Schumann, "Stille Liebe."—Sun.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Two very interesting concerts were given at Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School, Feb. 2, by Mr. Charles Klausner, one of the most able teachers of music in the country. Messrs. Julius Schubert, violinist, Charles Werner, violoncellist, and F. von Inten, pianist, were the artists, and sustained their reputations as good musicians. The following programmes show how much is done in this institute, in regard to musical education:—

First Concert.—Trio, piano, violin and violoncello, B flat, op.—Beethoven; a. Canzona, violin, op. 85, No. 5—Raff; b. "Impatience," violin, op. 20, No. 3—C. Schubert; Prelude and Fugue, E minor, "Notre temps," No. 3—Mendelssohn; Serenade, violoncello, from the Concerto, op. 34—Lindner; "Faschings-schwank aus Wien," piano, op. 26—Schumann; "Amourette," Violin, Romance, op. 20, No. 3—C. Schubert; Introduction and Polonaise, violoncello and piano, C. op. 3—Chopin; Serenade, piano, and violoncello, E flat, op. 148—Fr. Schubert.

Second Concert.—Trio, piano, violin and violoncello, D, op. 70, No. 1—Beethoven; Larghetto, violoncello—Mozart; Canon and Fugue, piano, on a theme by Mozart—A. A. Klengel; a. "Adelheid," chant for violin—Krebs; b. "Mystification," violin, capriccio, op. 19—C. Schubert; Two Moreaux, piano and violoncello, op. 11—Rubinstein; Ballade, piano, G minor, op. 23—Chopin; a. "La Desir," violin, romance, op. 25, No. 25—C. Schubert; b. Tarantelle, violin, op. 83, No. 26—Raff; Noveletten, piano, violin and violoncello, op. 29—Gade.

PLYMOUTH, MASS.—A fine Concert of miscellaneous music, consisting of choruses from Oratorios, Part Songs, Glees, Songs, &c., was given by the "Plymouth Choral Union," on the evening of Friday, 3rd inst., to an audience that filled Davis's Hall to overflowing.

This young society, organized but a few months since, have been hard at work under the direction of Mr. F. H. TORRINGTON, of Boston, and the fine rendering of the programme at this, their first concert, was conclusive evidence of the ability of the director, and very complimentary to the ladies and gentlemen composing the chorus.

The solos were all taken by members of the society, and some of them finely sung.

Mr. Torrington, also, played a very fine Violin solo, which received the encore it deserved, to which he again responded.

An "Orchestral Grand" Piano of Hallett, Davis, &c., sustained the full chorus with telling effect.

BALTIMORE.—The New York Weekly Review is "sorry to state that the orchestra of the Peabody Institute has been dissolved. Whoever could have advised the step must have had little sympathy for the cultivation of musical art, and surely violated one of the principal stipulations of the founder. Thousands of dollars were destined every year to be used for the purpose of propagating the taste for music, and because the concerts so far did not pay, they had to be discontinued and the orchestra disbanded. Thus Baltimore is at present without an organized professional orchestra, and must be satisfied with one chiefly consisting of amateurs. The latter organization enjoys the venerable name of the Haydn Society. It was formed about eleven years ago, and gives, during the course of a year, four subscription concerts. The orchestra consists of six first violins, six second violins, four violas, three violoncellos, two double basses, two flutes, one oboe, two clarionets, two trombones, two cornets, two horns, drums and tympani. With the exception of Messrs. Jungnickel, Maas, Metz, J. W. and Harry Deems, and the conductor, Mr. Tichde, all the members are amateurs, representing various phases of the cultivated classes of society in Baltimore. They come together once a week, in the large music room of Mr. J. W. Deems, a very indefatigable worker in the field of music, who recently wrote a pianoforte method which, when published, will surely be successful, as it is really progressive and practical. The event of the week was the series of concerts given by Mr. Theodore Thomas, who, together with Miss Anna Mehlig and his orchestra, appeared for the first time before the Baltimore public."

DEATH OF MR. STEINWAY.—Mr. Henry Steinway, the founder and chief of the celebrated firm of Messrs. Steinway and Sons, died at his residence in New York last Tuesday, in the 73d year of his age. His decease was the result of a lingering illness. He was a native of the Duchy of Brunswick, in Germany, where he was born on the 15th of February, 1797. Very early in life he exhibited musical taste and talent. He used even then to make musical instruments—the cythera and the guitar—on which he played, in a skillful manner. His first pursuit was cabinet-making. Then he worked in an organ factory. Then he studied piano making. Finally he established an independent business. In 1850 he emigrated to this country, bringing his whole family, excepting one member—and continued in the piano trade. Their first establishment was in Varick street, and was opened in 1853. In the next year they moved into more spacious quarters, in Walker street. Their first great business success was made in 1855, when they won a gold medal by a piano—constructed on a new plan—which they exhibited at the American Institute Fair, at the Crystal Palace. Thereafter the business of the firm steadily increased. In 1859 they erected the mammoth factory which they still keep in action. The late Mr. Steinway retired from active business some years ago; but he retained to the last his interest and pride in the firm which he had founded, and which he lived to see enrolled among the most prosperous and renowned establishments in the United States. The three sons of Mr. Henry Steinway—William, Theodore, and Albert—who have managed the house with great skill, will hereafter constitute the firm. Mr. Steinway has passed away at a ripe age, and when the work of life had been well done; and he leaves an honored memory as well as an important trust to his descendants.—Weekly Review, Feb. 11.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Over the Merry Campanian Plains. 2. F to f. L. Bordese. 35

Lively semi-Italian melody, suggestive of artist life on the Roman Campagna.

The Swallow. 3. Ab to f. Ciro Pinsuti. 40

Poetry from the "Afterglow," which means the "Twilight." Perfectly charming melody, which will elicit applause in parlor or concert hall, and pretty accompaniment.

"Rising, floating, wheeling,
Thro' the azure blaze,
Like a summer feeling
Flashed from other days."

Twenty Years. 2. F to f. F. B. 40

Poem by Bret Harte, who sings warm-heartedly of friendship and old memories. Vignette title.

"Beg your pardon, old fellow! I think
I was dreaming just now when you spoke.
The fact is, the musical link
Of the ice on your wine goblet's brink,
A chord in my memory woke."

Tho' absent, not forsaken. 4. G to e. J. H. Spier. 30

Varied, effective melody.

I arise from dreams of thee. 4. D♭ to a.

W. A. Smith. 30

Words by Shelley. Fine melody and effective concert song.

"I arise from dreams of thee,
And a spirit in my feet
Has led me, who knows how?
To thy chamber window, sweet."

The Golden Streets. Song and Chorus. 2.

G to d. W. Kittredge. 30

A sweet, pure song well fitted to be popular in "meetings" and Sabbath Schools.

"When we go up the Golden Streets We'll sing the songs of Zion."

Woodland Echoes. 3. A♭ to f. M. W. Huckleton. 30

A quick, light, sweet, "pattering" melody, with a pretty echo introduced.

"Summer on the hills in royal robes is glowing,"
'Mid the fragrant leaves the sweet wild rose is growing."

Instrumental.

Life Dreams. Waltzes. 3. A. H. Fernald. 60

A capital set of waltzes, [four, with coda] all full of rich melody.

Wanderstunden. (Leisure Hours.) 5. D♭.

S. Heller. 40

Wonderfully sweet and rich. While it is a true piano piece, it has the easy flow and close connection of a good organ composition.

Day-Dawn Galop. 3. F. Mrs. Rose. 40

Suggests that it must be composed by a teacher, as it is a nice instructive piece, spirited and interesting.

Saratoga Belles. Waltzes. 3. J. S. Knight. 50

Among the best of the "sets" by this favorite composer of Dance music.

Serenade. 4. G♭. Op. 16. C. A. Eisoldt. 40

Not easy to sleep to this serenade, which has a full awakening quality, but it is well worth lying awake to hear. A fine composition.

La Villa Rossini.

[Translated for this Journal, from Le Gaulois.]

'It will be curious, some day, to sketch the eccentric encampments assigned by the necessities of the war to the corps francs: sometimes a factory or a public ball room, a church or a café; sometimes a farm or a historic house, an abandoned quarry or a young ladies' boarding school.

The tirailleurs éclairés Parisiens, and the company of francs tireurs Deschamps, to which I had the honor of belonging, occupied alternately an abode illustrious among all, Rossini's villa.

Pallas encamped at the house of Apollo, as an old marine said, a franc-tireur of my company.

This Villa Rossini, which all Paris knew, is situated on the Avenue Ingres, at the gate of the Bois de Boulogne, with its back as it were against the ramparts.

Large, high, white, square and citizen-like, it lifts its head rashly above the fortifications, and seems built on purpose to receive the bombshells.

There lived and died the author of Guillaume Tell. And from there, our remingtons upon our shoulders, our revolvers in our belts, we set out for the Moulit-neux, the bridge of Sèvres or Billancourt.

Rossini adored his villa and this charming, this admirable Bois de Boulogne, where he walked incessantly, till it became like his own private park. Everybody knew him, loved him, in the neighborhood, and the guards of the Bois pointed out complacently the little tufted valley where he promenaded every morning, and the rustic bench on which he used to sit.

Where now shall we find the little bench and tufted valley? where the Bois de Boulogne?

It burns between our two andirons.

Poor Rossini! He, whose teeth were set on edge so by the shrill scream of the locomotive, what would he have said of the marine pieces of the honorable M. Fleuriet de Langle, pleading without respite, but a little strong, the cause of Paris?

What would he have said, above all, to see his peaceful villa, where he sur-niente d so voluptuously, transformed into a post of francs-tireurs?

In the antichamber, instead of flowers, caps and knapsacks, carbines and bayonets. In the vast kitchen where, gently leaning on his long cane, he did not disdain to come and watch with his own eye, so amiable and fine, the macaroni that he loved, a franc-tireur is paring onions, or stewing a cat soldier fashion.

In the grand saloon, painted in fresco, are mattresses in place of tapestry, and on these mattresses francs tireurs snatching a little broken sleep between two cannon shots.

In the time of the illustrious maestro I visited this celebrated villa, and I found it adorned with magnificent presents and precious souvenirs; on the mantelpiece, marvels of art, a very beautiful and very fine figure of the master of the house; then a superb medallion in Sèvres porcelain, with the names of all Rossini's masterworks for an inscription.

Farther on, in a delicious little salon, all hung with chintz, a very curious æolian harp.

In place of the harp we have to-day a chest, our chest of cartridges!

A large and beautiful iron railing, opening upon the garden, at the left of the oriental kiosk of the concierge, led obliquely to the house. But in front of the doorsteps, on the Avenue Ingres, was a little gate half hidden by dense ivy and surmounted by a gilded lyre.

It was Rossini's private entrance, and it was there we mounted guard.

Here, too, Rossini loved to stroll under the shade of the sycamores of the Avenue and to mingle, unknown, with the ball players at the Ranelagh.

Bombs have replaced the balls, and instead of the little gilded lyre, the flag of Geneva flaps sorrowfully in the wintry wind, and seems to bleed with its two cross-shape wounds.

The greatest luxury of this historic villa, which now for nearly five months has been our post of privilege, is the gardens sown with greensward and masses of shrubbery, decorated with statues and with a very beautiful fountain in carved stone: three allegorical figures, Faith, Hope and Charity, sustain, evangelically, a huge vase, from which fall long and tufted garlands of ivy.

One morning, after passing a snowy night upon the outposts, amid fire of musketry, we came back more in the humor, I assure you, of swallowing a good soup, than of humming a grand aria from Guillaume Tell.

In crossing the garden I suddenly desecrated a superb angora hanging in a bush,—an angora of the handsomest, the fattest, the most tender species!

—Providence has good moments, said I to myself. Behold our breakfast! Doubtless it is the God of armies who has sent it. Surely he has felt some compunctions, for, it must be confessed, he spoils us only moderately.

Saying this, I unsheathe my sword-bayonet; the furious cat glares wildly at me and, with a bound, takes refuge at the feet of the three theologic virtues—of the fountain.

I was hungry and gave chase: with a new bound he leaps upon the shoulder of Charity, as if he would make appeal to my sentiments of humanity.

I was hungry, I repeat it. I draw my revolver and take aim. Behold the creature crouching on the arm of Hope! I aim again, I fire, and . . . I perceive my angora squatting like a sphynx upon the head of Faith.

From this pedestal he plunges into the thicket and disappears. 'Tis Faith alone that saves!

That morning we breakfasted upon a shoulder of King Charles.

In the neighborhood of the Villa Rossini, at nearly equal distances, dwelt formerly Proudhon, Jules Janin, Lamartine.

* * * * *

The chalet of our master, Jules Janin, has always remained the discreet sanctuary of the Muses; but the abode of Proudhon has become a post of veterans or guardians of the peace; the chalet of Lamartine, those Charmettes, in the Bois de Boulogne, has been transformed into a park of artillery, and cannons crouch where sighed the singer of Eloire and Gratiella.

But as for us, we make our camp at Rossini's. To-day, tirailleurs and francs-tireurs have quitted the villa of the great maestro, and without doubt the little gilded lyre will shine again above that gate where we kept guard.

Adieu, Rossini! and, in the language of the old marine, franc-tireur of my company, Pallas, poor Pallas in deep mourning, thanks Apollo for his hospitality.

FULBERT DUMONTEIL.

The Hundredth Anniversary of Beethoven's Birth.*

ANOTHER ESSAY BY FERDINAND HILLER.

"Quasi Fantasia"

The year 1749 brought us Goethe; 1756, Mozart; 1759, Schiller; and 1770, Beethoven. Thus, within the short space of twenty-one years four of the greatest poetic geniuses were born—four men of whom not only the German Fatherland, but all mankind must be proud.

And even more happy than proud, since the most splendid gift which the Divine Being from time to time vouchsafes to poor humanity is that of genius. Through it we receive the highest good in which we are capable of participating—the forgetfulness of self in a nobler life. Genius it is that gives us, if but for a few short hours, that which the believer awaits with earnest hope in another and a better world.

Has there ever existed a poet who transported our souls into his ideal kingdom with more irresistible force than our Beethoven? Certainly not. More universal effects have been achieved by others, but none more deep or noble. Nay, we may say without exaggeration that never did an artist live whose creations were so truly new;—his sphere was the unforeseen.

Amidst so much that is trivial and dispiriting in art and life, the widely diffused interest, the delight in the creations of the wondrous man is a bright sign of our times. I do not say the comprehension of them; that is not, and cannot be the case. But there are, perhaps, no poems in the love and admiration of which so many of the highest intellects concur as the tone-poems of our master. To the essential nature of our Art, which bears within itself the all-reconciling element of love, must we attribute the fact that against it the most violent differences in religious, political, and philosophical opinion make no stand—it is the might of Beethoven's genius which subdues the proudest minds, while quickening the pulsations of the simplest hearts.

If in anything the will of man shows itself weak, nay, helpless, it is in the matter of intellectual creation. A very strong will (is not even this beyond the reach of most?) may lead to great learning, to brilliant technical acquirements, to virtue itself; a spontaneous poetic thought in word, tone, or color, it will never be able to bring forth. Thus, the true relation of genius to us is that of a star, diffusing light and warmth, which we enjoy and admire. Since, however, to the higher man recognition and gratitude are necessities, since he desires to add intelligence and reverence to his admiration, and would willingly offer up love also to the subject of it, he begins to investigate. He asks, what the divine germ, existing even in the lisping child, demanded for its development; what brought it out into blossom—what influences worked upon it beneficially—to what extent he who was so nobly gifted was supported and furthered by moral strength—how he used the talent committed to him—finally, how he fought through the life-struggle from which no mortal is exempt.

And then he inquires again and further: which of his qualities, which of the properties peculiar to himself, affects us most strongly?—in what relation does he stand to the development of his art—in what to that of his nation?—how does he appear with regard to his own century?

A mere attempt at answering these questions, and the many connected with them, would require an enormous apparatus of a biographic and æsthetic nature, including a knowledge of the history of art and culture, and an acquaintance with musical technicalities. It does not fall either within our power or the scope of these pages to make any approach to such a task. A few slight hints may suffice to prevent our forgetting (amid the extraordinary and all-engrossing occurrences of the present time) the day which sent to us a hundred years ago the no less extraordinary man, who, a prophet in the noblest sense of the word, foresaw and declared (though only in tones) the nobleness and greatness which will be revealed by the German people, if friendly stars shine upon their future.

A species of caste seems to have been implanted in man by nature—there are families of statesmen, warriors, theologians, artists. It will nevertheless be admitted that while it is often the case that circumstances, family traditions, cause the sons to follow in their fathers' footsteps, it frequently happens that the calling lays hold of the man, becomes, in the truest sense of the word, a calling.

Several of our first composers have sprung out of families in which the profession of music was chiefly followed—but certainly not many. One thing, however, was common to nearly all—they were marvellous children, prodigies. Prodigy! now-a-days an ominous word, recalling immediately to mind industrious fathers, who force on concerts, and musical attainments which do not refresh by their maturity, but only excite astonishment at the precocity of those from whom they are exacted. The abuse of the phenomenon has brought the latter itself into a bad light. A musical hot-house plant forced into premature bloom through vanity or the thirst for money may soon become stunted; none the less, however, does the fact remain, that no intellectual gift shows or develops itself earlier than that of music. Bach, Handel, Mozart, Hummel, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Clara Schumann, Liszt, Joachim, were prodigies. Nature knows what she is about. He alone to whom this wondrous tone-language has become a second mother tongue, will be able to express himself with freedom in it; but how soon do we begin to attempt our mother tongue! And how few succeed in really learning to speak it!

It would be inexplicable had not our Beethoven been almost a prodigy. He was one, but after such a sound, healthy sort, that those about him were more struck by the thought of his great future, than enthusiastic about his achievements at the time. The compositions which have been preserved to us from his boyish days bear traces, even then, of the frank, honest mode of expression which remained his to the end of his career. Naturally, their contents are trifling; what has a boy of twelve years to communicate to the world, if his inner life develop itself according to nature? Borne onwards by his artistic readiness, he attained, however, at a very early age an honorable, independent position with regard to the outer world. He had barely quitted childhood when he was organist at the Elector's Court in Bonn. At a later period he occupied for several years the post of violist in the orchestra. The viola was then one of the most neglected orchestral instruments, and we must form but a slight estimate of Beethoven's achievements upon it. It was, however, invaluable for him, the future Commander of the instrumental tone-world, to have served in the line. In fact, every striving young composer ought, as a matter of duty, to act for at least one year as member of an orchestra, were it only at the great drum. It is the surest method of making the individuality of the different sound organs ineffaceably one's own. When the latter are entrusted to capable executants (as was the case in the Electoral orchestra), the idea of a definite personality is added to the peculiarity of the instrument, which is not at all a bad thing. How often in later years may the image of one or the other of his former colleagues have presented itself vividly and helpfully to the mind of the master, as he sat meditating over a score! How often may he have heard in spirit an expressive solo performed by one of them!

The stimulus which Beethoven received from singers in those early days at Bonn did not work very deeply. His own father, indeed, was one of the Elector's vocalists, and sang both in church and on the stage. But he was a sorry fellow, who saw in his gifted son only a means of extricating himself from his gloomy pecuniary difficulties, and certainly not the man to inspire him for the wedding of Word to Tone—the noblest union ever contracted.

Even in the most magnificent of Beethoven's vocal works there exists a certain roughness; the words domineer over the melody, or the latter over the poem. That perfect union—that melting in one another of both factors—which is peculiar to Mozart and Handel, is found only separately (vereinzelt) in him. Would a youth spent in the midst of a great song-world have led our master along other paths?

Certainly not without significance for his development was the fact, that he was born on the lovely banks of our joyous old Rhine. Do we not sometimes hear it surging like a wave of the mighty stream through the Beethoven harmonies? Do we not feel ourselves blown upon by the fresh mountain air? And do not the cordial, true-hearted melodies, which so often escape from the master, breathe the very magic of one of those enchanting evenings which we talk or dream away on the shore of the most truly German stream? The taste for an open air life (a life im Freien, in freeness, as the German language so nobly expresses it) remained faithful to him until the end; and we can scarcely picture him to ourselves than as wandering in forests and valleys, listening for the springs which sparkled within himself.

Scientific knowledge, even in its most elementary form, was hardly presented to the notice of the young musician, and if at a later period any interest in such pursuits had arisen within him, he would have been obliged to dismiss it. On the other hand, he buried himself with his whole soul in the loftiest works of poetry, that second higher world, and always came back with renewed delight upon the works of Homer, Shakespeare, Goethe, and Schiller. Many and varied were the influences which they exerted upon him. They were to him "intellectual wine," as Bettina once named his music. But those are completely mistaken who expect to find, either in them or anywhere else, positive expositions or elucidations of Beethoven's compositions, as some have occasionally attempted to do, building their theory partly on utterances of the master. When the latter refers the constantly inquiring secretary, Schindler (I know not on what occasion), to Shakespeare's "Tempest," it was, after all, only an answer—nothing more. The awakening of pure musical imagination is just as inexplicable as are its results. One thing alone stands firm, that which speaks to the heart, came from the heart,—but the life-blood which pulsates at the heart of the true artist is a thousand times more richly composed than that which flows in our veins. No æsthetic physiologist will ever be able to analyze it completely. And in life, is it only the deep thoughts, the extraordinary occurrences, which call forth all our sensations, out of which alone our happiness and our misery are formed? Is not a calm, serene autumn day enough to entrance our inmost nature? a single verse to console us? the friendly glance of a maiden to throw us into the sweetest reverie? What trifling influences affect the eternally rising and falling quicksilver of our hopes! And thus the smallest occasions may have been sufficient to cause vibration in a soul so highly strung as Beethoven's. Most powerfully, however, in such a genius, worked the pure creative impulse, that eternally glowing fire in the deepest recesses of his nature, with its volcanic—but, in this instance, blissful eruptions.

We know that Beethoven proceeded as a young man to Vienna, which he never afterwards left. He found there (at least in the first half of his residence) enthusiastic admirers, intelligent friends, admission to distinguished circles, and lastly, that most necessary evil—money. Nobody will grudge to the lively, good-humored, imperial city the fame of being able to designate as her own a brilliant line of our greatest tone-poets. But then she ought not to take it amiss that we should wonder how, within her walls, at that time, so magnificent an artistic development as Beethoven's should ever have been accomplished. Shall we say, not because, but—in spite of her? or shall we utter the supposition that no agglomeration of men can be sufficient for genius, since it treads a way of its own, which bears no names of streets? When, however, the question comes under discussion, of the relation of a great composer to that public among whom his lot is cast, we cannot deny that it is easier to understand how a Handel created his oratorios in the so-called unmusical London, than how Beethoven composed his symphonies in the musical Vienna of the period. The former found himself in London in the midst of a grand public life,—grand were the powers over which he held sway, like the continually increasing throngs of listeners who streamed to his performances. When, on the other hand, we hear of the difficulty with which Beethoven, during the course of a quarter of a century, succeeded in giving about a dozen concerts in which his Titanic orchestral poems were performed for the first time, we become faint at heart. And I cannot do otherwise than express my conviction that, under other conditions, no inconsiderable portion of his works, which are (to use Schumann's expression) veiled symphonies, would have revealed their true nature. The world of the musicians would hardly have been more enriched thereby, but the musical public would have benefited. For millions would have been edified, where now hundreds torment themselves (with quartets and sonatas) for the most part in vain.

Yes! these symphonies and overtures, with their unpretending designations, are the first poems in our time, and they are national poems in a far truer sense than the songs of the Edda, and all connected with them, ever can or will be for us, despite the efforts of littérateurs and artists. Yes! in the soul of this Rhinelander, who every day inveighed against the town and the state in which he lived, who was zealous for the French Republic, and ready to become Kapellmeister to King Jerome—in this soul was condensed the most ideal Germania ever conceived by the noblest mind. With the poet we may exclaim, "For he was ours!"—ours through what he uttered—ours through the form in which he spoke—ours, for we were true to the proverb in the way we ill-treated and misunderstood him.

"Industry and love" Goethe claims for his countrymen. No artist ever exercised these qualities with regard to his art in a higher degree than did Beethoven. She was to him the highest good—no care, no joy of life could separate him from her. Neither riches nor honors estranged him from the ideal which he perceived and strove after so long as he breathed. He never could do enough to satisfy himself either in single works or in his whole career. He spared himself no trouble in order to work out his thoughts to the fullest maturity, to the most transparent clearness. To the smallest tone-picture he brought the fullest power. His first sketches, like the autographs of his scores, show in the plainest manner that inflexible persistency, that unwearied patience, which we presuppose in the scientific investigator, but which, in the inspired singer fill us with astonishment and admiration. In all conflicts (and every artistic creation is a conflict) the toughest difficulty is to persevere.

Truth was a fundamental part of Beethoven's character. What he sang came from his deepest soul. Never did he allow himself to make concessions either to the multitude and its frivolity, or to please the vanity of executants. The courage which is bound up with this resembles the modest bravery of the citizen, but it celebrates even fewer triumphs than the latter.

Beethoven was proud, not vain. He had the consciousness of his intellectual power—he rejoiced to see it recognized—but he despised the small change of every-day applause. Suspicious and hasty, he gave his friends occasion for many complaints, but nowhere do we find a trace of any pretension to hero-worship. He stood too high to feel himself honored by such proceedings; but, at the same time, he had too much regard for the independent manliness of others to be pleased with a homage which clashed against that.

What a fulness of the noblest, the sublimest conceptions must have lived and moved in him to admit of their crystallizing themselves into the melodies which transport us!—softness without weakness, enthusiasm without hollowiness, longing without sentimentality, passion without madness. He is deep but never turgid, pleasant but never insipid, lofty but never bombastic. In the expression of love, fervent, tender, overflowing with happiness or with melancholy, but never with ignoble sensuality. He can be cordial, cheerful, joyful to extravagance, to excess—never to vulgarity. In the deepest suffering he does not lose himself—he triumphs over it. He has been called humorous—it is a question whether music, viewed in its immediateness and truth, be capable of expressing humor—yet it may be that he sometimes “smiles amid tears.” With true majesty does he move in his power, in his loftiness, in the boldness of his action, which may rise to defiance—never to senseless licence. A little self-will shows itself here and there, but it suits him well, for it is not the self-will of obstinacy, but of striving. He can be pious, never hypocritical; his lofty soul rises to the Unspeakable; he falls on his knees with humility, but not with slavish fear, for he feels the divinity within. A trace of heroic freedom pervades all his creations, consequently they work in the cause of freedom. The expression, “In Freien”—liberty! might serve as the inscription on a temple dedicated to his genius!

Like nature herself, he is varied in his forms, without ever relinquishing a deep-laid, well-concerted basis; he is rich in the melodies which he produces, but never lavish; he acts in regard to them with a wise economy. In the working out of his thoughts he unites the soundest musical logic to the richest inventive boldness. Seldom only does he forget the words of Schiller,—“In what he leaves unsaid, I discover the master of style.”

This wise economy does not forsake him either in the selection or the number of the organs which he employs. He avoids every superfluity, but the spirits of sound which he invokes must obey him. Nevertheless, not to slavish servitude does he reduce them; on the contrary, he raises them in their own estimation by that which he exacts from them. What might be urged against him, perhaps, is that he sometimes makes demands upon them to which they are not adequate, that his ideal conception goes beyond their power of execution.

He has spoken almost exclusively in the highest forms of instrumental music, and where, in one way or other, words are added to these, he has always been actuated by high motive. He sings of Love and Freedom with Goethe, of Joy with Schiller, of the heroism of Conjugal Love in “Fidelio”; in his solemn Mass he gives expression to all those feelings which force their way from man to his Maker.

Enough, enough! we would never have done, were we to say all that could be said about such a mind. Dare we now really claim his creations, which breathe the highest humanity, as specially German? I think this will be granted us when we add to it the consideration that our greatest poets and thinkers have, in like manner, struck root firmly in their nationality, whence they have grown up—away, beyond—into those regions from which their glance embraced but one nobly striving human family.

It has been often declared that we, for long, felt and recognized our national unity only through the works of our poets, artists, and philosophers; but it has never been fully recognized that it was our first tone-poets in particular, who caused the essential German character to be appreciated by other nations. There are, perhaps, no two German names which can rejoice in a popularity—widely diffused in the most dissimilar nations—equal to that of Mozart and Beethoven. And Haydn, and Weber, and Schubert, and Mendelssohn! what a propaganda have they made for the Fatherland! That they speak a universal language does not prevent their uttering in it the best which we possess as Germans.

Nevertheless, as men are constituted, it is not to be denied that what enchants does not on that account overawe them; they esteem the beautiful, they respect only force and strength, even should these work destructively.

Well, then! Germany has now shown what she can do in this way; she will bloom afresh, and follow out her high aims in every direction. The consideration which we could long since have claimed as a people, will then be freely accorded to the German state.

As a musician, I can wish for the nation nothing better than that it should resemble a Beethoven symphony,—full of poetry and power; indivisible, yet many-sided; rich in thought and symmetrical in form; exalted and mighty!

And for the Beethoven symphonies I could wish directors and executants like those of whom the world's history will speak when considering the nineteenth century. But History, if at all true to her task, must also preserve the name of the man who, nearly seventy years ago, created the Eroica,—an achievement in the intellectual life which may place itself boldly by the side of every battle which has left invigorating and formative traces on the destiny of mankind.

Mendelssohn at Buckingham Palace.

The original of the following interesting letter by Mendelssohn has just been published by his son in a German periodical. With the Pall Mall Gazette, from which we borrow the translation, we wonder how many more of these charming effusions are lying concealed.

Frankfort, July 19, 1842.

MY DEAREST LITTLE MOTHER,—I must tell you a little more about London and of the days after our trip to Manchester. I could not make up my mind to go to Dublin because of the twelve hours' sea journey, the thought of which crushed all my ideas. We spent two peaceful days in Manchester with the uncles and aunts, but as soon as we got back to London the whirl began again. I shall tell you all about it verbally—how disgracefully Cécile carried on with Sir Edward Bulwer, and how old Rogers (Sam Rogers, you know) squeezed her hand and begged her to bring up her children to be as charming as herself, and to speak English as well (this made a sensation) and how Mr. Roebuck came in (ask Dirichlet who he is), and how we played charades at the Beneckes', and Klingemann acted a West Indian planter and Sir Walter Scott, and how the Directors of the Philharmonic gave me a fish dinner at Greenwich with whitebait and speeches, and how they sang my Antigone music at the Moscheles' (I must imitate that on the piano for your benefit—I see Rebecca laughing already: but why does she never write?) and how I waited for Herr von Massow at the Brunswick Hotel, and spoke to Herr Abeken at the Bunsens', and how we had a great dinner at the Bunsens'—all this I shall describe minutely when I see you; but I must at once tell you all the details of my last visit at Buckingham Palace. I know how it will amuse you, dear mother, and me too. It is, as G. says, the one really pleasant and thoroughly comfortable English house, where one feels à son aise. Of course I do know a few others, but yet on the whole I agree with him. Joking apart, Prince Albert had asked me to go to him on Saturday at two o'clock, so that I might try his organ before I left England; I found him alone, and as we were talking away, the Queen came in, also alone, in a simple morning dress. She said she was obliged to leave for Claremont in an hour, and then suddenly interrupting herself, exclaimed, “But goodness, what a confusion!” for the wind had littered the whole room, and even the pedals of the organ (which, by the way, made a very pretty feature in the room), with leaves of music from a large portfolio that lay open. As she spoke she knelt down and began picking up the music; Prince Albert helped, and I too was not idle. Then Prince Albert proceeded to explain the stops to me, and she said she would meanwhile put things straight. I begged that the Prince would first play me something, so that, as I said, I might boast about it in Germany; and he played a Chorale, by heart, with the pedals, so charmingly and clearly and correctly that it would have done credit to any professional, and the Queen, having finished her work, came and sat by him and listened and looked pleased. Then it was my turn, and I began my chorus from “St.

Paul”—“How lovely are the messengers.” Before I got to the end of the first verse they both joined in the chorus, and all the time Prince Albert managed the stops for me so cleverly—first a flute, at the forte the great organ, at the D major part the whole, then he made a lovely diminuendo with the stops, and so on to the end of the piece, and all by heart—that I was really quite enchanted. Then the young Prince of Gotha came in, and there was more chatting; and the Queen asked if I had written any new songs, and said she was very fond of singing my published ones. “You should sing one to him,” said Prince Albert; and, after a little begging, she said she would try the “Frühlingslied” in B flat—“If it is still here,” she added, “for all my music is packed up for Claremont.” Prince Albert went to look for it, but came back, saying it was already packed. “But one might perhaps unpack it,” said I. “We must send for Lady —,” she said. (I did not catch the name). So the bell was rung, and the servants were sent after it, but without success; and at last the Queen went herself, and while she was gone Prince Albert said to me, “She begs you will accept this present as a remembrance,” and gave me a little case with a beautiful ring on which is engraved “V. R. 1842.” Then the Queen came back and said, “Lady — is gone, and has taken all my things with her. It really is most annoying.” (You can't think how that amused me.) I then begged that I might not be made to suffer for the accident, and hoped she would sing another song. After some consultation with her husband he said, “She will sing you something of Gluck's.” Meantime the Princess of Gotha had come in, and we five proceeded through various corridors and rooms to the Queen's sitting-room, where there was a gigantic rocking horse standing near the sofa, and two big bird-cages, and pictures on the walls, and splendidly bound books on the table, and music on the piano. The Duchess of Kent came in too, and while they were all talking I rummaged about amongst the music, and soon discovered my first set of songs. So, of course, I begged her rather to sing one of those than the Gluck, to which she very kindly consented; and which did she choose?—“Schöner und schöner schmückt sich!” sang it quite charmingly, in strict time and tune, and with very good execution. Only in the line “Der Prosa Lasten und Mühen,” where it goes down to D, and then comes up again chromatically, she sang D sharp each time, and as I gave her the note both times, the last time she sang D, and there it ought to have been D sharp. But with the exception of this little mistake it was really charming, and the last long G I have never heard better, or purer, or more natural from any amateur. Then I was obliged to confess that Fanny had written the song (which I found very hard, but pride must have a fall) and beg her to sing one of my own also. If I would give her plenty of help she would gladly try, she said, and then she sang the Pilgerspruch “Lass dich nur,” really quite faultlessly, and with charming feeling and expression. I thought to myself, one must not pay too many compliments on such an occasion, so I merely thanked her a great many times; upon which she said, “Oh, if only I had not been so frightened; generally, I have such long breath.” Then I praised her heartily and with the best conscience in the world; for just that part with the long G at the close she had done so well, taking the three following and connecting notes in the same breath, as one seldom hears it done, and therefore it amused me doubly that she herself should have begun about it. After this Prince Albert sang the Aerndt-lied, “Es ist ein Schnitter” and then he said I must play him something before I went, and gave me as themes the chorale which he had played on the organ and the song he had just sung. If everything had gone as usual, I ought to have improvised most dreadfully badly, for it is almost always like that with me when I want it to go well, and then I should have gone away vexed with the whole morning. But, just as if I was to keep nothing but the pleasantest, most charming recollection of it, I never improvised better; I was in the best mood for it, and played a long time, and enjoyed it myself so that besides the two themes I brought in the songs that the Queen had sung, naturally enough; and it all went off so easily that I would gladly not have stopped; and they followed me with so much intelligence and attention that I felt more at my ease than I ever did in improvising to an audience. She said several times she hoped I would soon come to England again and pay them a visit, and then I took leave, and down below I saw the beautiful carriages waiting, with their scarlet outriders, and in a quarter of an hour the flag was lowered, and the Court Circular announced, “Her Majesty left the palace at twenty minutes past three;” and I went off in the rain to the Klingemanns, and had the double pleasure of pouring out all my news to them and to Cécile.

I must add that I begged the Queen to allow me to dictate my A minor symphony to her, as that had really been the inducement to my journey, and because the English name on the Scotch piece would look doubly well. Also, I forgot to tell you how just as she was going to begin to sing she said, "But the parrot must go out first, or he will screech louder than I shall sing." Upon which Prince Albert rang the bell, and the Prince of Gotha said he would carry it out, and I said, "Allow me," and carried the great cage out, to the astonishment of the servants. There is plenty more to say when we meet; but if Dirichlet goes and thinks me a little aristocrat because of these long details, I swear I am more radical than ever, and call to witness Grote, Roebuck, and you, my dear little mother, who will be as much amused by all these details as I am myself.

Verdi on Modern Art.

INTERESTING LETTER FROM THE COMPOSER.

We reprint the subjoined remarks and letter from the Pall Mall Gazette:—"After the death of Saverio Mercadante," says that journal, "who for so long a period was regarded as the patriarch of Italian (especially Neapolitan) musicians, his post as director of the Musical Conservatory at Naples was offered to the author of 'Il Trovatore,' 'La Traviata,' and 'Rigoletto.' Signor Verdi, however, too well satisfied with the position he has held, and still holds in a great measure, as the most popular dramatic composer of his time, did not appreciate the honor intended to be conferred upon him, and replied to his friend, Signor Florimo, who conveyed to him the proposal of the directing members of the Conservatory, as follows:—"

GENOA, JAN. 5, 1870.—Dear Florimo: Nothing could have flattered my amour propre more than the offer of the directorship of the Naples Conservatoire, conveyed to me through you, from the professors of that institution, and from so many Neapolitan musicians. It is painful to me not to respond as I could wish, but, with my engagements, habits, and love of independent life, it would be impossible for me to undertake so laborious a task. You will say: "How about art?" Very good; but I have done as much as I have been able to do for art, and, if occasionally I am to do more, it is indispensable that I should be, as before, entirely free. Were it otherwise, you may imagine how proud I should be to occupy the position once held by such founders of a school as Scarlatti, Durante and Leo. It would have been glorious for me (nor would it be just now a step backward) to train pupils in the strict and profound, though clear and simple studies of those great masters. I should have liked, as it were, to stand with one foot on the past, the other on the present and future; for of the "Music of the Future" I am not afraid. I would say to young students: "Practice fugues constantly, assiduously, and to the utmost, until you have become so strong and sure as to subject the notes to your will. You will thus learn to compose with freedom, to dispose the various parts naturally, and modulate without affectation. Study Palestrina and some of his contemporaries; pass then to Marcello, and direct your attention chiefly to recitative: attend now and then performances of modern operas without yielding to the fascination of florid harmony and orchestration, or chords of the diminished seventh—quicksands, or harbor of refuge (as it may be) to all who do not know how to write four bars without their assistance." After superadding a broad literary culture, I would say, finally: Write in good faith, and (provided you can boast of an artistic organization) you will become composers. At all events you will not swell the crowd of mere imitators, or be lost among those morbid representatives of our time, who, while searching and searching, and sometimes working skillfully, yet never succeed in lighting upon anything new.

For singing I should also have recommended the old school, combined with that of modern declamation. To put in practice these rules, apparently so simple, it would be necessary to superintend with so much assiduity that twelve months in the year thus exclusively employed would not suffice. With my home and personal interests so remote from your city, how could I possibly attend to all these things? Be good enough, my dear Florimo, to express my great regret to your colleagues and to the musicians of your "bella Napoli" that I cannot accept an offer with which I feel so highly honored. I trust you will find the man of whom you are in want—one, before all, learned and strict in discipline. Licenses in counterpoint may pass, and occasionally prove effective on the operatic stage; but in a Conservatoire, to progress is to go back to the ancient rules and canons.

Adieu! Believe me ever, yours affectionately.

Marx's Characterization of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

BY A. E. KROEGER.

SECOND PART.—WITH CHORUS.

And now, according to the well founded construction of a symphony we ought to hear the fourth movement. Thereby the Ninth Symphony would be closed and completed in the manner of the previous eight. But quite a different thing was resolved by fate and the spirit of the master.

There he stood at the boundary of his symphonic empire. His fate had separated him from men, and he had founded for himself this empire, had lived in this instrumental world into which he had breathed his life and spirit. He had unlocked this life with wizard power to the entrance of the Idea. These beings, that to others appeared mere tools of wood and metal, he had made into the image of man, human souled, so that you often think: now the mouth of that instrument must open itself and speak words, human words. And yet the instrument was not man, was not his like, gave not satisfaction to his often erring, often deceived, always love-desiring heart. Men, men he needed; that friendly society, which he expresses a longing for in his Last Will, and which he always longed for, the brotherly embrace. More than all the enchantments of his strange world would have been to him that friendly intercourse from which fate had remorselessly excluded him.

This he confesses now. When the Finale of his Symphony ought to have begun, a wild cry of the orchestra rends the harmony, and breaks with crashing fury into the peace of this world. A mighty recitative of the Basses follows with strong emphasis: are the instruments to speak? Once more the indignant orchestra utters its cry and the basses speak again, but words not understood. And now fly, like the shadows of fleeting clouds, past the vision of these speakers, the dream forms of their past life: the energetic command of the first movement, in opposition to the milder speech of the bass voices; the fairy dance of the second movement, in opposition to the greater urgency of the bass voices; and finally the evening song of the third movement, that fearful, tranquil, parting word. And now these speakers, the first ever called from instrumental life into the world of speech, start the melody.

"Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness,
Daughter from Elysium!"

Not, however, in the tone of that grand hymn, which continues:

"Hearts on fire, with step of lightness,
On thy holy ground we come!"

But in altogether a popular tone. Men, only men, in brotherly communion, walking arm in arm; this is his whole desire now, he is so weary of his sway in solitude apart from man! The dull, deep basses softly articulate this melody in a half-whispered and confiding tone; it seems like long buried memories of youth. It is like a half-forgotten song, which you hum to yourself as if you wanted to recall all its tones again. Then, after the song has passed by in utmost self-content, with repetitions of every part by the basses (with the violoncellos), and is now repeated an octave higher by the united violoncellos and violas, a second voice joins it, as if by accident, and comfortably walking its own way; then again another one; there is here a truly wise intuition of an artist's mind, in opposing this innocent, simple folk-song to the highest flight of phantasy, to the most powerful and most tender feelings. It tells all, confirms all, that we have dared to unriddle and interpret, with the certainty of a child's faith. Those, who find no chord in their breast to sympathize with it, must be referred to what the sublimest teacher said to his disciples: "Unless you become little children again, you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven."

Now for the first time the thought of that life-picture,—which in the second movement (407th measure) smiled on us so home-like, spreading itself out lovely and full of glow, as when upon the long absent wanderer from the last height breaks forth unexpectedly in the evening sunshine the loved scene of home,—becomes intelligible to us. "This we have lived through and fought out; thither we are now beckoned!" There is a wonderful unity in this work, for it is not made work: Beethoven lived it.

Gradually other voices join; the folk-song blooms and grows into glad some triumph, from which, however, a look of tender emotion (poco ritenente) falls back upon the past. We have always found Beethoven purely human, never in an abstract, self-made exaltation.

For the third time the cry of the rebellious orchestra interrupts.

But now, when the bass voices come in again, they are real human voices; that instrumental recitative has become a human word, a human recitative: "O friends, not these tones! But let us start others, more pleasant, more full of joy!" Thus cries Beethoven from out his longing heart. This is the decisive word; the master himself has found and uttered it. Let none with cheap knowingsness sneer at the expression of the thought! He who was able to conceive it, and who has "spoken with tongues" as Beethoven has in this Symphony, is the proper one to choose the words for the thought which his deeply moved and simple heart has found.

And now the voices,—human voices, call:

"Joy, O joy!"

And human voices raise the hymn,

"Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness!" &c.

In that same simple people's melody. For that which is most profound and grand finds at all times its last sanctification and confirmation in the heart and mouth of the people.

The further progress of the symphony needs no closer consideration. The melody is first sung by a solo voice (barytone) and closed by the chorus (without soprano) in the manner of a refrain. At the second strophe:

"He, whom happy fate hath granted,
Friend to have and friend to be,

it is again repeated by the solo voices, and again closed in refrain by the chorus, this time four-voiced. How thoroughly Beethoven had given himself up to the thought of this simple folk-song, is here confirmed, for the words:

"Yes, who in his heart's sure keeping
Counts but one true soul his own!
Who can not, oh! let him, weeping,
Steal away and live alone."

are sung in tranquil mood to the same melody,—and this by the lonely Beethoven. The following verses are sung by the solo voices, again with a refrain by the chorus, to the same, but varied (figurative) melody; and the final words:

"Before God the seraph stands," give to the song a solemn change; the modulation takes up the dominant B-flat major.

Here a very solemn, nay mysteriously intoned march rhythm,—a variation of the same melody,—leads with considerable expansion to the verses:

"Joyful, as his suns are flying
Through the heaven's glorious plain,
Brothers, on your pathway gale,
Joyfully like heroes vieing."

sung by the hero voice of the tenor, with male chorus joining in. With breadth and splendor, in fugato style, the orchestra alone bears along the festival march to victory, until finally, amidst the stormy impetus of the string instruments and the rhythmic calls of the wind instruments, the folk-chorus again sets in with the first verse, to the simple tune, raising and ending it an bacchanalian triumph.

Very solemnly and powerfully,—a chorus of priests celebrating the brotherly love of all men,—the male chorus now intones:

"Oh! embrace now, all ye millions!"

And when the higher voices of the chorus fall in, when all the wind instruments, even the trombones, make themselves heard above them in wide octaves, while the basses, with the other string instruments, in festive elaboration of their dactylic rhythm range through the spacious rooms of these grand harmonies: your soul grows quiet and festive as when you hear the sound of an organ and of a church choir in a wide, empty cathedral, lit up by the sunlight streaming through the lofty windows.

Finally the chorus crowns the whole in a grand elaboration of the first melody, rising to perfectly dithyrambic exultation.

Now, the important point does not lie in all these single moments, not in the marvels of instrumentation and invention, of which we might tell; but rather in the fundamental thought, which occurs at the transition from the instrumental, the Symphonic music, into human music, into Song. Whoever has educated himself to recognize thoughts in music, will find this transition and dissolving of opposites—wherein the instrument strives after the word and the human speech, the recitative has not yet been able to tear itself loose from the instrumental manner of music—quite as artistically genial as in Goethe's Faust the transition of Helena's shade into a new corporeal substance, or, in Aristophanes's comedy, the descent of Dionysos into Hades. Your eyes see the impossibility, and yet you believe. That is the triumph of art.

But the fundamental thought of this work is of threefold significance. First, in a biographical way: Beethoven's life-work, in all its breadth and glory—yet undeniably accompanied by the never-quieted desire of the solitary man for the circle of human society. Secondly, in an artistic way: the two halves of the tone-realm are weighed in a just scale and united, with equal justice to each, so far as each can go. Finally, in a purely human way: the human in opposition to the external world approves its highest claim upon man, and not till then does the external approach, dissolve and reunite itself with the human, and enter its proper sphere. We cannot seize either nature or whatsoever of spiritual life may move around and over us, with love and justice, except through the Human.

Such was the Ninth Symphony. It was composed from November, 1823, to February, 1824. It had to be the last one. For it was the spoken separation. Another symphony could have been only a retrogression to a previous standpoint.

Biography of Palestrina.

Hardly had he held his post at the Pontifical Chapel for six months when his patron died. Pope Marcellus, who succeeded him, and whose worth, wisdom, and avowed intention of "restoring to Divine worship its genuine solemnity," might have rekindled all his hopes, died also on the twenty-second day of his pontificate, and was succeeded, in May 1555, by the austere and stern Paul IV., the same Carrafa, who, as cardinal, had re-established the Inquisition. We read of him, that he "seemed to know no other duty, no other occupation, than the restoration of the old faith to its former dominion." His avowed object on commencing his pontificate was the noble one of making the reform of the Universal Church and the Roman court his chief care; and it used to be his boast, towards the conclusion of his pontificate, that he had not suffered a day to pass without issuing some order towards the restoration of the Church to her original purity. Unfortunately for Palestrina, there was brought to light, in the course of these reforms, an ancient enactment which prohibited any one not in holy orders from singing in the Pope's choir. The consequence was, that our artist, together with two other married men, were deprived of their appointments. Palestrina, who till then had thought his position in life secure, found this sudden blow almost heavier than he could bear. The faith that could support him beneath such a shock must have been of no ordinary character. What a temptation was it for him to abandon the ecclesiastical, and take up with the secular side of his calling! The way had been opened for him already. With such a reputation as he possessed, he might have established a school at Rome, which would hardly have lacked pupils. But nothing could alter the bent of his mind, or shake his attachment to the Church, to whose service he had once for all devoted himself. Retiring to a sorry cottage on the Monte Celio, he calmly awaited the return of better days.

When his health, which had at first suffered severely from this sharp and unlooked for visitation, was sufficiently restored, his friends, to whose assistance he had meanwhile been indebted for his support, procured for him the place of chapel-master at St. John Lateran, which then happened to be vacant. This was still in the year 1555. He held the post for six years, and during that time produced a great number of works; among others, the celebrated Improperia, or Reproaches, which to this day ennoble the solemnities of Good Friday in the Sistine Chapel at Rome.

To understand this composition, it will be necessary to take a momentary glance at the ceremonial observed in the Pope's Chapel during the three last days of Holy Week. The offices of these three days, so arranged that the first, or Thursday office, shall begin at four on the Wednesday afternoon, are called Tenebre. One by one, as each of the appointed psalms is concluded, the lights, placed upon a triangular stand, are extinguished. On Good Friday, amidst the darkness so produced, is made visible the image of the Saviour. The Clergy approach to do reverence on their knees; and while they are thus engaged, the Improperia of which we are speaking are chanted by the choir. They consist of mild expostulations and rebukes, such as were addressed of old by the Redeemer to His people through the prophets; supposed to be addressed now by himself personally to his Church:—"O my people, how have I wearied thee, or in what have I offended thee," &c. Mingled with these reproaches, there rises at intervals from the assembled people the hymn of the Trisagion (thrice holy), being an ascription of praise and adoration, offered in response to the reproaches of the Saviour by his conscience-stricken and penitent people.

Of course the full effect of this simple but sublime composition can be realized only on the occasion for which it was written, and amidst the accessories by which it is then surrounded. But to hear it so sung, we are told by one in every respect qualified to pass an opinion, "slow, yet bold, full yet soft, with the melting modulation which that choir alone can give, produces a feeling of sweet devotional melancholy, a mildened emotion, which not even the more artificial and far-famed Miserere can excite." The Improperia were first produced in the year 1560, when such was the impression made by them that, in the following year Pius IV., who then filled the papal chair, requested the composer to allow a copy to be taken for his chapel, where it has since been performed every year as a regular stated part of the Good Friday offices.

Those of our readers who would desire further examples of the spirit and manner in which this great composer strove to give musical expression to the services of the Christian year, may find them in the Advent anthem, "Canite Tuba," which is given in the collection of motets above noticed, and is considered by some of his editors to be the finest composition of the kind he ever wrote; or in the equally celebrated "Fratres Ego," which have been published separately by Novello. This latter composition, narrating the institution of the Lord's Supper, forms another feature in the musical services of the Sistine Chapel during the Holy Week, being sung on Maundy Thursday. Like every thing else in that chapel, it is performed without instrumental accompaniment. The choir, or rather choirs (for it is written in eight parts), draw near to the steps of the altar, and ranging themselves on opposite sides, give a most simple and melodious rendering of the sacred narrative, such as aids us most powerfully in the realization of the affecting event which it describes.

In these and the like instances did Palestrina labor with undoubted success in the reformation of Church music. But he has yet to appear before us in a more eminent position even than this. We have hitherto spoken of him as the reformer; now, in the year 1565, during the eventful sittings of the Council of Trent, we have to speak of him as the very saviour (if we may be permitted the expression), of Church music to his brethren. It will be borne in mind here, what has previously been said of the general state of music in Rome and elsewhere, at the era of which we are speaking. The influence of Palestrina himself, considering the proverbial jealousy of the profession, we can hardly expect to have extended beyond the immediate sphere of the churches where he held his appointments: in the rest, the abuses and profanations to which we then alluded, continued to prevail. "It is no wonder, then," to quote the words of the historian Ranké, "that the Council of Trent took offence at the introduction of such music into the churches. In the course of the proceedings, Pius IV. instituted a commission, for the express purpose of inquiring whether music should be tolerated in the churches or not. The question was very doubtful. The Church required that the words sung should be intelligible"—a reasonable request surely; the ordinary plan being to render the holy text quite incomprehensible through the contrapuntic maze of canon and fugue by which it was enveloped—"and that there should be an accordance between them (the words) and the music."

This the musicians asserted was unattainable by the laws of their art." The essence of harmonic music, they said, consisted in imitations and fugues, the withdrawal of which would be tantamount to its annihilation. "Cardinal Borromeo was one of the commissioners, and his austerity might easily have led to the adoption of a harsh resolution." Fortunately, however, the cardinal, who with all this austerity, as the historian terms it, was one of the best and wisest men of his Church and day, was at that time arch-priest of Santa Maria Maggiore, where Palestrina had held the office of chapelmaster since March, 1561. The compositions which he had heard in this church, no doubt, convinced Borromeo that he might safely trust the cause of Church music to his hands. Through his influence, therefore, the composer was commissioned, on the 10th of January, 1565, to write a mass such as the council required; and he was at the same time warned that on his individual efforts the whole cause rested: "The life or death," as the historian expresses it, "of the grand music of the mass," which, if he failed, was to be thenceforth forever banished from the house of God. We can easily picture to ourselves, and we must certainly sympathize with, the feelings of one so eminent, and yet so modest as Palestrina, when he thus found the very existence of the science which he loved with such intense ardor, made to depend on his own individual efforts. An affecting record remains to prove alike his anxiety, and the source whence he sought help; a record which indicates the abiding presence of that religious spirit which we have observed on so many previous occasions, and which, in fact, never failed, in whatever difficulties, to sustain and animate this thoroughly Christian man. On the first page of his MS. the historian has recorded that there were found written the words, "Lord, enlighten mine eyes."

The result of his labors appeared in the course of a few months, viz.—three masses, of which one in particular, the third, was hailed with universal admiration and delight; the Pope himself comparing it with the heavenly melodies, such as the Apostle John might have heard in his ecstasy. This is the composition which goes by the name of Pope Marcellus's Mass; not, however, as the common story goes, because written at his behest, and receiving his approbation. Pope Marcellus, as we have seen, had died ten years previously. Still under that title Palestrina did actually dedicate the work to Philip II. of Spain; no doubt from a feeling of gratitude to the memory of one who would have been his great benefactor had he survived; no doubt in the full consciousness that the mass itself was precisely such an one as Pope Marcellus would have delighted to hear.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—Herr Langert's opera of Dornröschen is in rehearsal at the Stadt Theater, and Herr Langert has himself arrived to superintend its production.—At the twelfth Gewandhaus Concert, the violinist was Herr Isidor Lotto, who achieved a great success at one of the same concerts several years ago by his performance of Paganini's "Carnival of Venice," but who has since been prevented from ill health from playing in public. He performed a Concerto of his own, and the "Devil's Sonata" of Tartini. He was much applauded in both. The programme included likewise, as more particularly appropriate to the season, two Christmas Songs for chorus, by Prützel and Schröder, and the Pastoral from J. S. Bach's Christmas Oratorio. The principal instrumental piece was Schumann's O major Symphony. At the eleventh Gewandhaus Concert, Mlle. Brandes, a young pianist from Schwerin, played Schumann's A minor Concerto, and Weber's Concertstück. Herr Gurs, a baritone from the Stadttheater, sang the grand air from Marschner's Hans Heiling, and songs by R. Schumann. The orchestral pieces were Weber's overture to Euryanthe, and Beethoven's O minor Symphony.

A Symphony by Herr Johann Svendsen was performed with considerable success at the twelfth Gewandhaus Concert. It had already been previously played at one of the Euterpe Concerts last year. Although containing some unmistakable reminiscences—the first motive of the first movement, for instance, recalling vividly to the hearer's mind Schubert's C major Symphony—it affords satisfactory evidence that Herr Svendsen possesses both strongly marked individuality and considerable talent in the management of the orchestra. Mlle. Marie Schröder, from Breslau, and formerly of the Theatre Lyrique, Paris, sang some songs by Deniseti and Gordiniani, whereas one or two leading musical papers are exceedingly wroth, because, they say, such compositions should be prohibited once for all at the Gewandhaus Concerts. Herr Benno Walter, from Munich, played Spohr's Concerto No. 9, and the Ballade and Polonaise by Vieuxtemps. The band performed Mendelssohn's overture, Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt, but not in their best style.—The following was the programme of the first Concert (second series) of Chamber Music: Trio, C major, Haydn; Stringed Quartet, C minor, Schubert; Sonata for Piano-forte and Violoncello [Op. 38], Brahms; Quintet for Clarinet and Strings, Mozart.—Land. Mus. World.

MUNICH.—Herr Willner, conductor of the Royal Vocal Chapel, and of the Roman Catholic church of All Saints, has frequently officiated as operatic conductor at the Theatre Royal, since Herr von Bülow left, last August. He has now been definitely appointed Herr von Bülow's successor. The King has also ordered, as already announced in the Musical World, that Herr Heinrich Porges, on whom the title of Royal Chambermaster extra status had been conferred, shall be employed as conductor at the Theatre Royal. Herr Porges is a determined partisan of Herr R. Wagner, and was sent for by the latter, in the autumn of 1867, from Vienna, to act as his collaborator upon the Süddeutsche Presse, then an official print. He will, therefore, be more especially employed to conduct the Wagnerian operas. It is said that Siegfried, the second part of the Ring der Nibelungen, will be positively produced this year. The piano-forte score will be published shortly. The composer is still working on the third part: Götterdämmerung.

STUTTGART.—Notwithstanding the exceedingly unfavorable state of things, 84 new pupils were, last autumn, entered on the books of the Conservatory of Music, which is under the immediate patronage of the King. The number of pupils is at present 444, only 16 fewer than last winter. Of these 444, 180—85 male and 95 female pupils—are studying music as a profession. 263 pupils belong to STUTTGART itself, while 27 come from other parts of Wurtemberg; 9 from Baden; 5 from Bavaria; 3 from Hesse; 12 from Prussia; 1 from Saxony; 1 from Saxony-Coburg; 1 from Bremen; 1 from Hamburg; 1 from Austria; 25 from Switzerland; 1 from Holland; 3 from France; 25 from Great Britain and Ireland; 18 from Russia; 1 from the Danubian Principalities; 37 from North America; and 3 from South America. During the winter season, 529 lessons are delivered every week by 24 masters and one lady-professor.

Wagner on Beethoven.

Most of our readers have probably heard and read of Richard Wagner's pamphlet entitled "BEETHOVEN," published on the occasion of the Centennial Celebration. We more than doubt, however, if the most metaphysical and German scholar of them all has had the courage to work his way through the document itself. We must confess we tried, and gave up in despair. A German paper, from which we make the following extracts, says:—"We question if the readers of the pamphlet will find their expectations fulfilled. For only the smaller half of it treats of Beethoven, the other is devoted to a philosophical exposition of the nature of music. And here Wagner exhibits a most astonishing talent for expressing himself bombastically, confusedly and obscurely. To him the direct expression of the will is a cry. Will is the one thing that forms the common basis of ourselves, and all things without us. A cry, i. e. sound, tone, music, is therefore the first, and most direct expression of the innermost essence of the world. The world of sound is so much above the world of light, and so near to the essence of the world itself, because it is unbound from the forms of the visible world, from space and matter. Could it be freed from the shackles of time too, it would then be the deepest revelation of the will, i. e., of the essence of the world, outside of time and space." (The word translated by essence here, is an untranslatable German term of Wagner's own making, so far as we know, "Das An-sich der Welt.") "Wagner therefore regards harmony more as real music than melody; for the latter, being a succession of tones, requires time, and does not express the timeless essence of the world as perfectly as harmony, which consists in the timeless chiming together of the tones. Melody and measure are to W. the fall of music from its primitive state of harmonic innocence; for with these it adopts time, and approaches the plastic art, the forms therefore of the visible world, the world of appearances, and of the intellect only. Real music, according to W., must therefore be one single, uninterruptedly sounding chord, without rhythmical measure, a musical repetition of the 'Om-Om' of the Brahmins, for thus it would approach most closely the unchangeable essence, the revelation of the will. Palestrina's music, in which 'rhythmic measure is as yet only perceptible through the changes of the harmonic succession of chords,' is to W. a 'dream-image of the world, of the most prophetic character,' because it is most distant from anything like time.

"We regret to be obliged to object to this, that even the mere changes of the harmonic succession of chords cannot exist without measure, and so will scarcely answer for 'timeless revelation!' Music only begins with a succession of tones; single sounds are not music, as single lines and colors are not painting. If music then is the revelation of the world nearest its essence, the musician is the real clair-voyant, and Beethoven is considered as the type of a musician, because his work was to penetrate through the outer forms of music to its innermost essence, in such a manner that he was able to throw the inner light of the clair-voyant back again upon outer things, and thus show these forms, too, according to the inner significance they bear."

Such is the curious philosophy of the apostle of the music of the future. We hasten away without any comments, leaving our readers to draw their own inferences and conclusions.

Far more satisfactory reading is afforded in the various admirable papers about Beethoven from the pen of Ferdinand Hiller, which we have copied recently;—perhaps the best of all of them on our first page to day.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The eighth Symphony Concert (Feb. 23) proved one of the most agreeable of the course. It also proved that it does not always need the "attraction" of a solo player, or a solo singer, to make a feast of pure orchestral music so enjoyable that no other element is missed. The programme was the following:

Overture to "Medea".....Cherubini.
First Symphony, in C minor, Op. 6.....Gade.
Overture to Byron's "Manfred".....Schumann.
Extr'acte from the same....."
Suite for Orchestra, in C, op. 101.....J. Raff.

Here were four names, standing for four distinct and well contrasted elements. First Cherubini, classical in spirit as in form. His Overtures are all characteristic introductions to real, noble musical dramas; and this to "Medea" is one of his best, worthy of the opera, which is one of the noblest and grandest after Gluck, Mozart and Beethoven. Contemporary, almost, with the latter: and this reminds us, that, in searching in old German musical journals for notices of the first productions of "Fidelio," we found none until it had been repeated several times, and then only a few lines about it, in which the critic seems to have thought it praise enough to call it worthy of comparison with Cherubini's "Faniaka," which had just been brought out for the first time, also in Vienna, under the author's own direction.—It is an Overture of which one cannot soon grow weary,—at least when played so well. (This week we were to have a modern Overture to Medea, to compare with it).

Then Gade, the Dane: the same old favorite Symphony, his first and best,—not heard now for four years, although in the meantime two others (No. 2, in E, and No. 4, in B flat) have been given in these concerts. This time another new one, that in A minor, was intended; but the non-arrival of the parts made it necessary to fall back upon the one which always proved a sure card with our public, the one which Mendelssohn brought out with such enthusiasm at Leipzig, calling it, in a letter to his sister, "this most original, most earnest, and sweet-sounding Danish Symphony."—perhaps as good authority as the critic in one of last week's newspapers, who admits that "in the Scherzo there was some very pretty nonsense—musical bon bons with full complement of sugar and jelly, and little indeed of real substance!"—The work was never better relished here in Boston, for it was indeed admirably rendered. The romantic Northern seashore spirit that pervades it, so vigorous in the first movement; full of glorious wild abandon in the Scherzo, and of fairy dance and moonlight in its Trio; so finely sentimental in the Andantino; and in the strong Finale like a summoning of all the clans, with a heroic, grand old Bardic song ringing through it, which one of our brave regiments might well have marched to, singing, in the war of the rebellion;—this, in spite of the perfect unity, artistically, of the composition throughout, brought it in strong contrast with the work of Cherubini.

Then Schumann, always individual, subjective, deep in feeling, imaginative, subtle, taking after Beethoven, but far less strong and healthful. The Overture to "Manfred" was too interesting last year to be laid aside and out of thought. Of course, if there were not something morbid, something passionate, impatient, gloomy and spasmodic in it, it would be no true rendering of the mood of Byron. But all this it has, with a great deal of musical beauty, originality and power. It deserves to rank with his Overture to "Genoveva," and will win admirers the more that it is heard.—Perfectly lovely after it, a relief to its dark mood, was the little Entr'acte from this Manfred music, full of sweet, reposeful melody; only much too short to pass with a single hearing, considering that it had never been heard here before.

Of the Suite by Raff, one of the new men, there will be various opinions. But all will grant that it was interesting. It had been played here once before only, by the Thomas Orchestra. It certainly is fertile in ideas and fancies, and in ingenious forms and ways of treatment. The Fugue, which some, on principle, might vote rather dry, is a sound, earnest, rounded piece of work, and held attention captive. The Minuet and the Scherzo are odd enough in their freakishness, but have a certain charm of which one would like to test the potency a little farther. Perhaps the Adagio is the most original portion of the whole; the March the least so, sounding Wagnerish at times, but mostly commonplace and coarse, and too much as if made to order for our street bands. The Orchestra had taken great pains with it, and succeeded well in mastering its many and peculiar difficulties.

The ninth concert came this week, the programme containing: Overture to "Medea," by Bargiel (new); Contralto Aria: "Buss und Reu," from Bach's Passion Music (first time in Boston), sung by Mrs. BARRY, in the place of Miss BRADLAW, who is unfortunately detained in New York by illness; Symphony in G, No. 13, Haydn.—Part II. Overture to "Bakuntala," Goldmark; Aria: "Bon confus pastorella," from one of Handel's Italian operas, and Goethe's "Mallied," by R. Franz; Overture to "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn.

Only one more remains, that for Thursday afternoon, March 23; and that is to be another BEETHOVEN Concert, with the following programme:

Overture to "Coriolanus".....Beethoven.
Piano Concerto, No. 5, in E flat....."
Miss MARIE KESS.

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.
 Piano Solos:
 a. Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue.....Bach.
 b. Polonaise in C, op. 89.....Beethoven.
 Miss Kanza.
 Eighth Symphony, in F.....Beethoven.

MR. B. J. LANG'S CONCERTS, at the Globe Theatre. The fourth and last of this very pleasant series drew an uncommonly large and cultivated audience on Thursday afternoon, March 2. This was the programme:

Quintet in B flat major, op. 87.....Mendelssohn.
 Concerto in C major, for three Pianofortes.....Bach.
 Pianoforte Pieces.
 Pianoforte Concerto, in D minor, op. 40.....Mendelssohn.

The favorite old Quintet, still associated with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, was well played, and its quaint, ballad-like Scherzando, its very animated first and last movements, and serious Adagio were heard with interest, though less exciting than in the early years of the Club when it reigned more exclusively. The Bach Concerto was played by Messrs. LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER, with quartet and double-bass accompaniment,—the three Chickering grands arranged en echelons, with the viola in the background, making a picturesque artistic group. The three pianists had about equal work to do, and all went evenly and well, with telling effect, and rich, full euphony, except in one or two passages of the beautiful and delicate Adagio, where they were not quite together, simply for the reason that they had not rehearsed it enough together; for, singly, each of those three artists was of course more than equal to any difficulties which such a composition could offer. The strong, exhilarating quick movements went to a charm; and what hearty, wholesome, strengthening and satisfying music it all is! If you think it enough to call it homely, conventional, old fashioned, you have yet to become well acquainted with it. When you are blasé and sick of more highly seasoned modern made dishes, you will find wholesome and refreshing food in this old Bach.

For piano solos, Mr. Lang played a couple of very graceful, airy, finished little fancies of his own, which were much enjoyed, and, in answer to an encore, another, not (we should think) from the same source, which seemed a little tame.—The D-minor Concerto of Mendelssohn, was, if we remember rightly, first introduced to a Boston public by Mr. Lang, with orchestra, more than a dozen years ago. It is needless to say that he plays it very finely now; but the Quintet abridgment feebly supplied the place of orchestra.

And so the pleasant company dispersed, rather reluctantly at thinking that no more such feasts remained.

MUSICIANS' RELIEF FUND SOCIETY. The annual concert for the benefit of sick and needy musicians, last Sunday evening, drew a very large audience to the Music Hall, which ought, however, to have been crowded for so good a concert with so good an object. The Orchestra was very large, comprising, besides the full Harvard Symphony Orchestra, some thirty members of the various theatre orchestras and bands, almost a hundred instruments in all. For the vocal numbers of the programme, Mrs. West, Mrs. Weston, Mr. M. W. Warrner, and the Orpheus Musical Society, had volunteered their services. The programme, rather oddly composed, but rich in good things, with a mixture of things new and curious, was as follows:

Overture, "Marschall" &c.....Mendelssohn.
 Concerto Aria, "Mentre ti lascio" [M. W. Whittney] Mozart.
 Postludium in F, for Organ, Trumpet, three Trombones and Timpani, [first time in America].....Makhausen.
 F. H. Torrington, M. Arbuckle, W. Brückner, A. Regenstein, W. Saul, W. Stoeck.
 Sacred Aria, "Praise ye the Lord," [Mrs. Weston] Salton.
 Concertino, for 4 Violins, with full Orch. &c.....Eichberg.
 J. Eichberg, Schultze, H. Suck, Carl Meisel.
 Overture, "Joseph and his brethren".....Mehul.

Unfinished Symphony, in B minor.....Frans Schubert.
 Recit. and Aria, "I will extol thee," from "Eli".....Costa.
 Mrs. J. F. West.

Vereinlied, [Orpheus Musical Society].....List.
 Serenade, for 5 Cellos, Contra Bass & Timpani, Schmenke.
 W. Fries, W. Bletsel, A. Suck, C. Kaltenborn, A. H. Lindl, A. Stein, W. Stoeck.
 Grand March, "Reception at the Emperor's," From "Lohengrin".....Wagner.

The first part was conducted by Mr. KOPPEL, the second by Mr. ZERRAHN. The two beautiful, though somewhat sickly, Schubert movements suffered somewhat from imperfect intonation in the oboe; but otherwise both that and the other classical orchestral pieces were very well performed, the great number of violins and basses giving a certain richness to the mass of tone. The Overture, "Reclined at Sea, and happy Voyage," was heard with real zest. And the honest, musician-like old Overture to "Joseph" was well worth revival after so many years.

Of the instrumental novelties, Mr. KROMER's Concertino (written, we believe, before he came to this country) made the most marked impression, and was applauded very warmly. It was no easy matter to keep up two or three long, melodious, florid movements in four instruments, so nearly akin, and alike in compass, as four violins; yet it was skillfully managed and with pleasing result, now by power of unison, and now by offsetting of pair against pair in happily contrasted motives or figures; the orchestration also was effective. A sustained and easy flow of melody, sometimes rather sweetish and Italian, characterized the piece; but the finale was quite bold. The four violinists were well up to their task. The same may be said of the five Violoncellists, &c. In the Serenade. The Postludium for Organ, trumpet, trombones and tympani, was, as a novel effect of bold, majestic, stirring euphony, quite interesting; but the composition itself is hardly of that earnest, manly stuff that could give us a fair idea of such effects as used in the Protestant churches of Germany.

Mr. WHITNEY sang the Bass Aria by Mozart in the noble voice and style which one expects of him. Mrs. West's Air was omitted on account of her illness. Mrs. WESTON sang the Aria by Salton with simple and refined expression, her voice being one of great beauty. But probably the most refreshing contribution to the general entertainment was the capital part-singing of the Orpheus Club, both of the "Union Song" by List, and the more lovely Serenade piece given for an encore. The March from Lohengrin, with its opposite pairs of heraldic trumpets, and all the rumor as of excited throngs kept up incessantly in all the strings, made an imposing close.

NEXT. Mr. JAMES WEHL, the pianist, gives the last of three popular concerts, at popular prices, in the Boston Music Hall, this afternoon.

The first of Mr. CARL GLOUGNER-CASTELL's matinees in Brackett's Hall, announced for March 1st, is postponed to next Wednesday, 15th.

CARL ZERRAHN takes his Annual Benefit at the close of the Symphony Concerts, namely, on the afternoon of Thursday, March 30. Of course he will have the assistance of the whole Orchestra, which he has so long and ably led, in rendering a fine programme of Symphony, Overtures, &c. Also of the famous young Saxon pianist, Miss MARI KANZA, who will play Schumann's Concerto and the A-flat Polonaise by Chopin.

There are hopes of a nice series of VIOLIN QUARTET Matinees, or Concerts, soon, by the LUTHERMAN-HENDL Quartet:—two pairs of brothers, who have played together long and carefully, and feel together. The programmes will be choice and varied. Such music will be particularly welcome; for, with all the richness of our musical season, there has been an utter absence of the Quartet element in all the winter's programmes so far.

Mr. ALFRED P. PECK, our friend of the Music Hall, has already engaged Thomas's Orchestra, Miss Mehlig and Mr. Ernst Perabo, and will engage others, for his Annual Concert, April 12.

Mr. PERABO's friends and pupils are to give him a series of four Complimentary concerts, at Wesleyan Hall, beginning on Friday, April 14, at 4 P. M.

NEW YORK, FEB. 27.—The second concert of the Church Music Association took place at Steinway Hall on Tuesday last. The programme comprised the following works:

Overture "Jubel".....Lindpaintner.
 Mass in C, No. 1.....Beethoven.
 Spring, from "The Four Seasons".....Haydn.
 The solos were sung by Mrs. Gulager (soprano), Mme. Krebs-Michaelis (contralto), Mr. Wm. Leggat (tenor), and Mr. Centemeri (basso.)

Lindpaintner was a German composer, born at Coblenz in 1791. The "Jubel" overture is a very extraordinary work, very brilliant and effective, and founded, like Weber's, on the national air, "God save the King." It was first played at the 25th anniversary of the accession of William to the throne of Wurttemberg, in 1841.

The Mass in C is of a very religious character, almost too much so for the concert room. It formed a marked contrast to the "Nely" one by Haydn, played at the 1st concert.

The "Kyrie" opens in very subdued tones. Towards the middle, some excellent orchestral effects are introduced. The "Sanctus" is one of the most lovely parts of the Mass, and the "Agnus Dei" is particularly interesting from some very elegant clarinet passages, and is in the Haydn vein. The whole Mass pleased exceedingly. It was played at the 3rd concert last year, and repeated by general request.

The "Seasons" is absolutely charming. There is not an uninteresting passage in the whole work. The solos and particularly the orchestral accompaniments are superb. The soloists acquitted themselves admirably. The chorus numbers about 250, and the orchestra 70, all under the direction of Dr. James Peck, to whom is due much of the success of the Association. The audience was the most brilliant and largest ever seen in Steinway Hall, everybody going in full evening dress. [!] The programmes contain excellent sketches of the works performed, by the conductor, this one containing a very interesting life of Haydn.

For the next concert, May 8, the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn, and a new Mass by Niedermayer, are promised.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society have in rehearsal for their next concert Haydn's 12th Symphony, and the overture "A calm at sea and happy voyage" by Mendelssohn.

The following are the programmes of the sixth and seventh pianoforte recitals of Miss Krebe at Steinway's small Hall. This young lady is fast becoming known as one of the most talented pianists that ever came to this country. On account of a fearful rain the sixth one was very poorly attended, scarcely fifty people being present.

Sixth Concert, Feb. 18.

Sonata, op. 81, "Carnactéristique".....Beethoven.
 Miss Krebe.
 Duo: "Nozze de Figaro".....Mozart.
 Miss Krebe and Sig. Randolf.
 (Gavotte, G minor.....Bach.
 "Des Abends".....Schumann.
 "Home, sweet home".....Thalberg.
 Miss Krebe.
 Ave Maria.....Gounod.
 Miss Krebe.
 Andante, with variations, B flat, op. 48.....Schumann.
 Mr. Mills and Miss Krebe.
 Song: "Die Thraene".....Stigall.
 Sig. Randolf.
 Rhapsodie, No. 4, E flat.....List.
 Miss Krebe.

Seventh Concert, Feb. 25.

Italian Concerto.....J. S. Bach.
 Miss Krebe.
 Song
 Signor Randolf.
 Etude.....Chopin.
 Valse.....Mendelssohn.
 Andante, e rondo capriccioso.....Mendelssohn.
 Tambourine.....Rameau.
 Home, Sweet Home.....Thalberg.
 Tarantelle.....List.
 Miss Krebe.

There were also some solos and duets by Mrs. Gulager and Sig. Randolf.

Mr. Wehl continues his recitals at the Union League Club Theatre and Booth's. At the Union League he played the "Moonlight" Sonata and pieces by Chopin, List, &c. The programmes were the same both weeks. One feature of his concerts is that each member of the audience is provided with the music to the pieces performed, which is returned at the end of the concert. J. M. W.

LISZT.—We hear from Pesth: "I should scarcely venture to send you 'musical' communications from our city, which is anything but plentifully supplied with good music, were it not for the man at the head of musical affairs here, whose power has spread far beyond the limits of Hungary, and who, teaching the new religion, surrounded by his disciples, is here worshipped almost like a god. I mean the Abbé Dr. F. List. The hopes that were aroused by his permanent stay here, have so far remained unfulfilled, though not through his own fault, and it will probably be some time before his artistic influence will make itself felt. The celebrated Abbé has formed a musical court here, and every Sunday holds a levee, called a matinée, at the house of the Minister with whom he resides, which is punctually attended by the handsomest ladies of the first families, by artists, singers, and journalists. I say punctually, for tardiness is most severely, and even publicly, reprimanded by the Abbé. After High Mass at ten o'clock, which he always attends, the hosts of the faithful assemble to see and hear the master. Not the 14th of the Louis could receive his Court with more exquisite politeness, and dignified stateliness. Majestically List passes through the rooms, distributing friendly nods and pressures of the hand, here an embrace, and there a kiss on the cheek. The latter salutation is granted to only a few, and only to those who put the hand of the artist to their lips. The kissing of hands has become quite customary.—Yet whoever has the pleasure of hearing List perform alone, forgets for the moment all the trivialities in which the great artist pleases himself. He rarely plays alone, but generally accompanied by the violinist Remenyi."

The History of Music.

ELEVENTH LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

(Reported for the Boston Journal Feb. 20.)

Mr. Paine, last Saturday noon, selected for his especial topic of discourse the early French and English Opera, and the establishment of German Opera at Hamburg.

The lecturer remarked that, having traced the history of the opera in Italy, from its source to the full tide of success, it might be profitable to follow the stream of events in other countries where the opera had gained an early footing, and where in the course of time it developed certain national characteristics, which contributed in no small degree to the ultimate reform brought about by Gluck and Mozart in this branch of musical art. In France, as in other countries, mysteries and masques were common for a long time previous to the establishment of the opera. Italian music was first introduced into France by Rinuccini, who went to that country in the suite of Mary de Medicis, on her marriage with Henry IV. The first regular opera was performed in Paris in 1645, by an Italian company introduced by Cardinal Mazarin. The pastoral opera, "La finta Pazzo," was sung. A few years later the "Orpheus" of Peri was performed, and not long after this the French began to do something themselves independently of Italy, producing in 1659 "The first French comedy with music," as it was called, the work of Peter Perrin and Robert Cambert. In 1669 Perrin was authorized by the king to establish an opera at Paris and elsewhere for the period of twelve years, and the opening piece, written and composed by Perrin and Cambert, had a run of eight months and richly repaid its originators. Before the term of years elapsed, the royal patronage was withdrawn and given to Lully. France did not at the outset resign herself to the charms of the Italian opera, but for a long time, even until the middle of the 18th century, pursued her own independent path in the development of a national style of musical art. She had no great traditional school of mediæval church music to educate and refine her taste, as was the case in Italy, Germany and England, and this very sterility in the musical life and organization of the French turned to their advantage, for in the absence of great works of musical art such as their neighbors possessed, their musical drama could come nearer to its ancient prototype, the Greek tragedy with music. John Baptiste Lully was a Florentine by birth (1633) and was taken to France, at the age of twelve years, as a page by Mademoiselle d'Orleans, the niece of Louis XIV. As she did not like his looks she degraded him to the kitchen as an under scullion, but as he exhibited great musical talent, he was given an education in that direction. He became a member and afterward leader of the King's band of twenty four violins, and subsequently was appointed Intendant of the Royal Music, in which capacity he composed one opera every year to the text of Quinault, poet, whom he engaged at a liberal salary. The king granted him letters of nobility and appointed him one of his royal secretaries, a post of high honor. His talents as a musician were decidedly inferior to his clear understanding of stage effects. He remodeled the form of the drama and had a keen insight into the true action of the play. Compared with his Italian and German contemporaries, his music makes a very poor show. It was more the work of a dilettante than a musician. Nevertheless his operas remained in vogue for a century. Lully died in 1687. His most noted successor was John Philipp Rameau, who was born at Dijon in 1683, and died in 1764. Rameau created a new era in French musical art. He studied under Marchand, the celebrated organist, and completed his studies in Naples. His first opera, produced on his return from Italy, created an uproar in Paris, on account of its innovations. Rameau was greatly superior to Lully as a musician, and was gifted with more talent and invention than the older French masters. He wrote thirty-six works for the stage. The absolute supremacy of the national opera of Lully and Rameau was greatly shaken by the introduction of the opera buffa by an Italian company, in 1752. "La Serva Padrona," by Pergolesi, was given with great success, and led to the production of French pieces in the same style, Rousseau giving in his adherence to the new fashion by composing his comic opera, "Le Devin du Village," in accordance with it. Duni, the Italian contemporary of Pergolesi, came to Paris in 1757, and introduced a new kind of musical drama, in which there was a good deal of spoken dialogue. This was the origin of the so-called opéra-comique, which was subsequently developed by French and German composers. The immediate French composers of this kind of music were Philidor, whose real name was Francis André Danican (1726-1795), Pierre Alexandre Monsigny (1729-1817), and, a generation later, André Ernest Modeste Grétry (1741-1813), Dalayrac and Gossec. The opera in England was under Italian influence almost from the outset. It enjoyed only a brief native existence under Purcell and Locke, and since that period to this day has been in the hands of foreigners, notwithstanding the various attempts that have been made to raise up a national school worthy of the enlightenment of the nation. The lecturer ventured the opinion that if as liberal and intelligent support had been given to English musicians, and as much love and devotion had been shown for the art after Elizabeth's reign, as was the case during that wise monarch's lifetime, a great national music would have grown up to match and far excel the work already begun by Tallis, Bird, Dowland and others. Puritanism could not tolerate art in any form, and consequently during its revolutionary sway the only noble school of music which England could boast of in her history was cut off. During the rule of the Puritans theatrical performances of all kinds were prohibited. The only exception was made in 1656 in favor of Sir William Davenant, who opened an exhibition which he called "An entertainment in declamation and music, after the manner of the ancients," which served as a kind of blind to the fanatical Puritans. The music to this piece was composed by Henry Lawes and others. This was followed by "The Siege of Rhodes" in still (?) recitative, which was consequently the first real opera sung in England. It was not before 1670 that the restrictions on stage plays were withheld. Charles II. encouraged theatres, music and the other arts, and it was during his reign that Locke, Purcell and Carey flourished, but it was beyond their power to repair the loss which English music had suffered during this long neglect. The Italians had already gained the ascendancy, and the opera had become a well established form of music. The Italians invaded England in full force, and at last Handel, the master of them all, arrived to hold the natives in subjection as a musical conqueror. Matthew Locke was born at Exeter, and brought up as a chorister in the cathedral of that city. His best known works are his opera of "Payche" and the music to Shakespeare's "Macbeth."

Henry Purcell, the greatest musical genius England has yet produced, was born in 1658. His musical education was completed under Dr. Blow, but his genius had shown itself at an early age. While a mere boy he composed anthems which are sung to this day. His talent for dramatic music was displayed equally early in life, and his first essay was made in this style when he was nineteen years old, in the form of an operetta called "Dido and Æneas." Purcell's church music has ever held an honored place in the Cathedral service of Great Britain. Like Mozart, Purcell died young—at the age of thirty-seven years. The French opera enjoyed only a brief career in England. It disappeared wholly after the year 1690, and the Italians began to invade England toward the end of the 17th century.

Henry Carey was born in 1695. He was the author of the words and music of charming songs and ballad operas. His melodies have a genuine, popular and national ring. His quaint and lovely song, "Sally in our alley," is as great a favorite to-day as it was a century and a half ago, and perhaps is the finest specimen of an English song. Chrysander justly calls Carey "the king of English minstrels."

The opera which had been introduced into Germany soon after its origin, by Henry Schütz, did not find universal cultivation for a long time, but before the Neapolitan masters of the 18th century had arisen to overrun Europe with their music and musicians, Germany witnessed a brief national development of the opera at Hamburg under Keiser, Mattheson, Handel and Telemann. It was principally through the determined zeal of Gerhard Schott, an influential citizen, alderman and jurist of Hamburg, that the opera was started and sustained. It lived for a period of over sixty years and declined after his death. The first ambitious experiment in dramatic music was made at Hamburg in 1678, when the new opera on the Goose market was opened with a musical play called "Adam and Eve." The words of this piece were by the royal poet Richter and the music by John Theile. During the first period of the Hamburg opera, the services of the composers Franck, Strangk, Foitsch, Conradi and John Siegmund Kusser were also employed. The last named was the forerunner of Reinhard Keiser, who was born about 1673 and became chapelmaster of the Hamburg Opera in 1694. Keiser, who was a man of great genius, composed about one hundred and twenty operas. John Mattheson was a Hamburger by birth, and a man of wonderful versatility of talent, being a writer as well as a composer, singer and performer. Handel's first opera, "Almira," was produced at Hamburg in 1705 with marked success, and it was withdrawn to make place for his "Nero." He also composed "Daphne and Florinda" for the Hamburg stage. Handel left Hamburg in 1706, and went to Italy the same year. George Philipp Telemann was born in 1681, and was chosen Chapelmaster after the death of the chief director, Schott. He was the composer of about forty operas, six hundred overtures, a number of oratorios, forty-four Passions, twelve church cantatas, beside much other music.

The musical illustrations to the lecture comprised a selection in the arioso style from Lully's opera of "Roland," a song of Purcell's from his music to Shakespeare's "Tempest," and a bass solo from an opera by Keiser, all of which were sung by Mr. J. F. Radolphsen.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal with Piano Accompaniment.

Jim. 3. G to d. F. B. 40

One of Bret Harte's productions, set to music in what might be called a chant recitative style. Immensely effective if properly sung. Lithograph title, with a view of "ornery-darned old long-legged Jim" and his friend.

"Say there! 'Praps some on you chaps Might know Jim Wild?
Well, no offence: There aint no sense
In getting riled!

God bless that little Church round the corner.

Song and Chorus. 2. C to e. E. Christie. 40

Fine view of the two churches on the title. Sweet melody, and fine song, to which the words of Thomas Jefferson, quoted above, make an appropriate heading. "That little church around the corner
It stands in beauty there to-day."

Little One, Good-night. 3. G to d. E. Pabst. 30

A sweet little good-bye song, which will apply to a pet child, or to a pretty lady, providing she is little.

"Kiss me once before I leave thee,
And thy spirit bright,
In my dreams will hover near me,
Little one, good-night!"

Norah, Sweet Norah. 2. D to d. W. T. Wrighton. 30

Beautiful Irish ballad, that glides easily with the voice, and cannot fail to please.

Instrumental.

Study in G. Op. 25, No. 9. 6. Gb. Chopin. 30

Not extremely difficult if played in moderate time, but if brought up to Allegro Assai, as marked, at the same time playing legato or staccato, putting in the accents, crescendos, and observing marks of expression, it will test the dexterity of a practised player. Quite graceful.

Blissful Moments. Mazurka Caprice. 6. C.

Chas. Wels. 60

A showy piece for exhibition, and excellent practice.

Four Sonatas: also Aria, Larghetto, Gavotte, Corrente for Piano by G. Battista Martini. 4.

Revised by C. Banck. 60

The present number contains the Aria, &c., and although marked for the piano, as naturally suggests the Reed Organ or Organ, for which instruments it furnishes useful practice and pretty music.

Autumnal Tints. 5. Ab. Sydney Smith. 75

The melody introduced in the Cantabile is a very musical one, is varied afterward in the composer's peculiar, dashing, brilliant style.

THE PESTALOZZIAN MUSIC TEACHER. By Dr. Lowell Mason and Theodore F. Seward. $2.00

Throw any crowd of ideas into Dr. Mason's orderly, mathematical mind, and they will straightway arrange themselves systematically, follow each other logically, and begin to march, as it were, to music. The present treatise is admirably arranged, and gives the results of this veteran's half-century's experience, in a manner which cannot fail to be understood.

Of value to all music-teachers, and, as it applies the system also to all branches of study, it is a most useful book for school teachers.

Additional chapters, with illustrative lessons in Arithmetic, Geography, &c., are furnished the principal of a State Normal School, Mr. John W. Dickinson.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

The Ethical and Religious Force in Beethoven.

From the German of AMBROS.

Beethoven's compositions, especially his Sonatas, are types of the powerful life of his soul. He strove for the highest good, and transferred to his music his impressions of the world, which with his spirit's eye he beheld and estimated. The most various moods can be found in his Sonatas: love, anger, defiance, resolution, sadness, longing, deep melancholy, serenity, courage, railery and wild merriment declared themselves, in a soul directed with all its strength towards the high and eternal. He had a deep, ethical nature; he grasped full human life, "finding his motives in the streets below" but "changing common language into the world's noble speech." He was a true idealist, inasmuch as he was not ashamed of familiar or trite experiences; for all and each became to him an Ariadne's thread to the sanctuary.

Beethoven occasionally wrote Christian music; but, let him write what he would, lightning from another world touched it. However manifold the expressions and mood, the ennobling and sanctifying spirit of the master pervaded all. A remarkable example of his power in this respect is the Pastoral Symphony. There he speaks with wonderful freshness and animation, as he wends towards the heights where Klopstock's Ode "Der Frühlingsfeier," meets him.

Earlier composers had given vent to their religious feeling in works ecclesiastical in form and purpose. To render a Symphony, a Sonata or a Violin Quartet, the medium for such a purpose had not been dreamed of, and Beethoven was the first to venture. His reverence for holy and eternal things was deep and true, and he has given expression to it in a number of compositions which are among his best, and which have been divided into three groups.

First, those relating to natural religion, that is, to thoughts of God, immortality, virtue and retribution. God is depicted as an almighty, all-true and holy being, the Father of all, who has created and sustains all, rewards the good and punishes the bad; a Christian idea thus composing the ground color. It is this higher light which transfigures the form of Fidelio, and shines in its fullest glory in the Ninth Symphony. To this class belong, besides several smaller pieces, the Pastoral Symphony and the C-minor Symphony, in which a higher hand suddenly opens the gate of the kingdom to a struggling wanderer of the night. "An die Hoffnung," the "Abendlied unter dem gestirnten Himmel" and the "Wachtelschlag" are happy echoes of the Pastorale. The incomparable Song to Hope, and the Abendlied, are poems which Beethoven wrote out of a full heart, the expression of his inner sorrow, hope and faith.

Mozart, having a presentiment of death, wrote his "Abendempfindung," similar in motive, yet very different. With him all is soft and dreamy; with Beethoven, strong and sublime. One mourns that he must leave the pleasant world and dear friends; the other longs for the future and has scarcely a glance left for this earth. With still stronger tones has Beethoven in the C-minor, and in the Ninth, Symphony, painted his sorrows and struggles and his firm hope of victory.

The powerful language of the C-minor Symphony was soon understood and became popular. The Ninth fared differently. Bearing the impress of struggle and the victory of an individual and strong personality, it was too colossal for the people. It was the cause of Humanity defended. When the first performance took place, on the 6th of March, 1826, at Leipsic, the impression was "on the whole unfavorable," and even educated listeners lost their faith in the excellence of any further productions of the master. It was played and then laid aside as a dangerous monster. To Griepenkerl belongs the honor of pointing out its high spiritual meaning and of showing how it rises above the subjective circle of feeling of the individual to the stage where the sight pierces the greatest heights and depths, and touches the loftiest thought of men. In 1858* it crossed the ocean and was performed in New York. It is no longer a subject of study for the technical musician, though it has taken more than a quarter of a century to convert it from that into the spiritual capital of many. It is now often the chief piece at musical festivals. A devout quiet reigns among the hearers as the clear treble (?) hovers over them like a gray mist, when in rushes the Theme, as a knight in armor, to show himself, vanishing again behind the storm-cloud. If unrestrained storm rages in the first part, in the second, Humor from his magic lantern casts the strangest shadows upon this wonderful world; mild zephyrs in the Adagio bring the fragrance of flowers and the leafy rustling of unknown Elysian hedges and of a peaceful paradise; the Hymn of Praise at last embraces heaven and earth, and we, still trembling with the shock, rise in a better and leave in a purer mood for our recognition of this work.

The foundation of this Ninth Symphony is Schiller's hymn "An die Freude," thus occasioning in some minds the false conception that Beethoven merely treats of Joy, whilst he really handles another subject found in two verses of the poem, "Alle Menschen werden Brüder," and "Brüder, über'm Sternenzelt, muss ein lieber Vater wohnen." The Brotherhood of Men, the Fatherhood of God, are the ideas he would express, and in these ideas are peace and joy.

Next to this mighty group stands the second, which is specifically Christian, yet without any confessional coloring. It embraces the Oratorio of "Christ on the Mount of Olives" and the "Six Spiritual Songs" in the text of Gellert (Op. 32). Beethoven undeniably wrote these songs for his own gratification; from the world little gratitude was to be expected, and therefore they speak to the heart and are truly the pious thoughts of a hermit. The first song: "I will pray before Thee," is the introduction to the rest.

If ever a Beethoven Union Society should be formed, it would be well to introduce among its statutes a section, to the effect that the Union should anxiously endeavor to buy up and destroy all scores or arrangements for the piano or voice taken from this Oratorio, and in all other ways to efface its remembrance. From beginning to end it lacks religious depth or awe; it is theatrical pathos, and sounds like a comic opera in its trivial motives and conclusions. It is very funny when Peter rushes forward and is with difficulty restrained by his master and the seraph; and again, when the Redeemer meets the death of the Cross with roudades in the style of the opera heroes, the impression is that of blasphemy. Nor does Beethoven do any better when he dresses up the word "Leidenskelch" (cup of sorrow), in the first Aria, with a pretty trimming of little notes, or places the Seraph as "prima donna assoluta" of the heavenly troupe. He apparently wrote this (1800) without being moved or warmed by the subject, and perhaps also, because the great success of the too lately published Oratorios of Haydn had rendered this kind of music popular.*

The third group, in which we would place the specific work of Beethoven for the Catholic church, embraces his two Masses. His Mass in D, which he himself considered his best work, and his gigantic Symphony in D minor (the Ninth) are like the two pillars of Hercules. Symphony music cannot surpass the Ninth, nor church music the Second Mass. The manner of writing, the spiritual direction, even the meaning, is alike in both; both preach the same gospel, one in the tone language of the concert hall, the other in the diction of the Church.

Beethoven's First Mass is related to the similar works of Mozart and Haydn, as his earlier Symphonies are to theirs. There is a visible continuation and building up akin to them throughout, in the mode of writing and expression, but all richer, more glittering, laid in broader dimensions, more intense in expression of feeling. What chiefly characterizes them is that catholic fragrance of incense and glimmer of candles which Mendelssohn perceived in the Second Mass; an observation that honors his insight, for a man must have lived from his childhood in the Catholic church to feel this feature in its strength. This peculiarity cannot be explained by adhesion to the style of his great predecessors, for it is deeper. Beethoven, born in a Catholic land, educated in corresponding knowledge, his father a servant of an ecclesiastical prince, carried these youthful influences into his life. When he undertook a theme worthy of his art he was thoroughly in earnest, and when he composed the Mass for Prince Esterhazy, his early impressions returned in all their power, with that magic with which later years glorify the first. There should be no dispute about Thorough-bass nor Religion, he thought; these were things conclusive in themselves. Yet such a strong, sincere mind must have had its doubts and inward struggles, and this work bore their coloring. In this Mass he placed the richest and highest results of his life. He showed therein what he had learned of fiery inspiration, of greatness, sublime flight of fancy, of inward feeling, of jubilee and complaint, of pain and bliss, of love, faith, hope. All the capacities of his loved art were displayed with masterly skill. "Vom Herzen, möge es zu Herzen gehen," he wrote on the score to the Kyrie, and to the Sanctus he added: "Mit Andacht."

* It was performed in New York, and many times in Boston, long before 1858.—Ed.

* This condemnation is indeed rather strong!—Ed.

It is wonderful that in all this power of expression the usual coloring of single sentences is visible. The relationship of the last part of the Mass with the final sentence of the 9th Symphony is unmistakable. There Beethoven begs for the peace which he, in his unhappiness, wants; he is overcome. In the C-minor Symphony, as in the Ninth, he reaches, through frightful conflict and emotion, the triumphal song, then humbly bends his head and throws a last glance, full of pain and hope, up to heaven. If Rubens mixed his colors with blood, Beethoven wrote with his own blood. In sublimity, like Handel, (the Kyrie); in artistic building up (?) of voice, like Bach; in magic sounds, like Mozart, (the Benedictus), the master has plucked for himself a garland of unfading flowers.

Composers of earlier times separated their sacred from their profane music. For Beethoven all music was the service of God; and here he reaches his hand to Bach; for to the latter, also, whether he wrote for a church choir or for a single piano, it was the same. To both men, Art, in and for itself, in its best purity and significance, was the highest aim for that spiritual life buried in God.

Biography of Palestrina.

We cannot better illustrate the universal admiration which this effort of genius continues to this day to command, than by placing in juxtaposition the remarks of two eminent living writers, of very opposite views in most other respects—the Protestant historian, Ranke, and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Melipotamus. "The mass known by the name of Pope Marcellus's" (says Ranke) "surpassed all expectation. It is full of simple melody, yet will bear comparison, in point of richness and variety, with any that preceded it; its choruses separate and meet again; the meaning of the text is incomparably expressed; the Kyrie is all prostration, the Agnus is very lowliness, the Credo majesty. . . . By this one great example the question was set at rest forever, and a course opened in which have been produced the most beautiful works, and the most touching too, even to those who do not profess the Romish faith." And then he continues with a truly German enthusiasm: "Who can listen to them, and not feel his spirit stir within him? It is as though nature became endowed with tone and voice: as though the elements spoke, and the sounds of universal life mingled in spontaneous harmony to hallow and adore; now undulating like the sea, now soaring heavenward in exulting bursts of jubilee. The soul is borne aloft to the regions of religious ecstasy, on the wings of universal sympathy."

Dr. Wiseman's remarks on the mass in question are as follows:—"It is in six voices, having two basses and two tenors. As Palestrina intended to avoid all airs, and to give to each part an ever-varying movement; and as it was consequently necessary that each, from time to time, should repose; he took this expedient, and secured a firm substructure for his harmony, by the stability of his middle and lower parts, as the trouble and contralto could well sustain the shriller harmonies. The effect of this arrangement is wonderful. In most modern choruses one or two parts, at most, have a movement, while the others are either kept on sostenuto notes, or else, if more than four, in unisons. But in this mass, as in all his music, there is no riempitura, or filling up; every part, as Dr. Burney terms it, is a real part, as important as the other; all full of vigor, life, and movement. The consequence is, that when performed it has a power beyond most compositions in twelve or sixteen voices."

Such was the mass, so famous in the history of music, recommended by the Council, for whose decision it was written, as a model for all future composers, and still performed in the Pope's chapel on the Saturday in the Holy Week.

Palestrina was now at the zenith of his fame, in the full vigor and maturity of his intellect; and the ten years' period during which he remained at S. Mary's (from 1561 to 1571), was fruitful in great works. But we grieve to find that, notwithstanding all he had done for the Church, he was left to struggle with poverty, nay, absolute want. This, in a man of his high principle, and strict laborious life, could not possibly have been owing to any extravagance or irregularity on his own part. No, the true explanation is afforded us by the account of the stipend he received as composer to the Apostolical chapel, an appointment bestowed upon him on the production of the mass just mentioned, and which he was permitted to retain together with his post at S. Mary's. The beggarly sum attached to this high-sounding office amounted to about twelve shillings a month; and this for the "Prince of Music," as he was now called; the man whom all confessed to have rescued from utter ruin, to have revived and perfected, the decaying and degraded music of the Church. He was a man who from principle would not devote himself to the pursuit of secular music, although most people would think he had a motive sufficiently strong in the necessity of providing for his now numerous family; but he confined himself strictly to his own peculiar vocation, and this was his reward. So dazzled and bewildered apparently were his countrymen with the splendor of his genius, that they forgot to provide for him the necessities of life. Palestrina was admired, lauded, and left to starve; and this has been the case with many, we have reason to fear, whose talents have been devoted to the same cause: at the present moment we know that in our own cathedrals there is no adequate income offered to organists or choir-masters; no income sufficient to induce a Church musician, even of the least self-interested views, to devote his days and nights to his own peculiar line of art. He must needs allow secular pursuits and engagements to encroach, more or less, upon his ecclesiastical duty; the Church comes to be regarded but as one engagement among many; and thus a secular tone is imparted to his opinions, his views, his compositions, his performance. Few there are whose devotion, like that of Palestrina, will enable them to suffer cheerfully, as he did, in the cause of their art. Shall we congratulate ourselves on the discovery that we do not, as a nation, stand alone in our neglect and contempt of those who deserve better at our hands; or shall the discovery cause us, as is more befitting, to blush deeply, both on their account and our own?

Nor was the poverty of Palestrina, albeit great and distressing—distressing more especially on this account, that it prevented him, as he more than once pathetically laments, from publishing his compositions—the only way in which the faith of this great and good man had to be tried. His circumstances were no doubt bettered when, in 1571, he succeeded his deceased friend, Giovanni Animuccia (also a pupil of Goudimel), at the church of S. Peter in the Vatican. At this time he also became music-master of the Oratory of S. Philip Neri, and undertook the superintendence of the school of music which had been founded at Rome by his friend Nanino. But while applying himself with undiminished ardor to the duties of his calling, he was visited with severe domestic calamities. Three sons, who had given early promise of excellence, were taken from him by death; and his only surviving child, far from emulating the example of his father, did but give him cause to lament his continued undutifulness and rebellion. In addition to all these sources of sorrow, he had to sustain, in 1580, the loss of his wife—the darkest cloud, perhaps, of all that overshadowed the concluding years of his long and anxious life. The composition which he wrote on this occasion to the words of the 42nd Psalm, is nevertheless the expression of a calm and tranquil spirit, such as we may conceive to have lain far beyond the reach of outward troubles. This is the motet, "Sicut cervus," given by Hawkins in his "History of Music." So full are its subdued strains of faith and heavenly resignation, as to prove at once to us that the mature age of the composer has not belied the promise of his youth, but that he is in every respect the same; the same in principles, and the same in practice, as when he offered the first-fruits of his genius and devotion to the chief Bishop of his Church, or implored the Divine aid upon his efforts to save the services of that Church from impending destruction.

Our composer retained his post at the Vatican until his death in 1594. Of the last fourteen years of his life there are few records remaining. Indeed, they would afford but scanty materials for the chronicler, varied, as is most probable, only by the alternation of public duties and private studies. We read of his attending, in the year 1586, with a body of singers, to assist in celebrating the erection of the Obelisk, set up in the Vatican by Sixtus V.; while of his private circumstances we have a more touching memorial, in the dedication of a book of Lamentations inscribed to the same Pontiff (and of which it has been said that the very preface is itself a lamentation), wherein he records, with his own hand, the want of means which so fatally interfered with his long cherished design of committing all his various works to the press.

Neither the want of resources, however, nor the indifference of those who ought to have been his most firm and zealous patrons, could make him waver in the course he had marked out for himself, or damp his accustomed ardor for composition. Poor as he was, he seems to have resigned to his friend Nanino the active direction, together with the emoluments, of the school in which they were jointly concerned, rather than divert to any secular occupation the time which he wished to devote exclusively to the choir. If he interfered, it was but occasionally, for the purpose of inspection, or to settle disputes.

To this period belong the Sacred or "Spiritual Madrigals," a style of composition new hitherto to Palestrina, being devotional music for the chamber rather than the church—a sign, we may suppose, of the gradual progress and increasing cultivation of vocal music. In point of pathetic tenderness and sweetness of expression they have never been surpassed.

But we are now being hurried rapidly to the close of the composer's life. The dedication before alluded to had been, in some degree, effectual. Persons of distinction, both among clergy and laity, had at last come forward with the means of presenting to the world those masterpieces which, on this account only, had been delayed. Their author was about to devote himself, with his accustomed ardor, to their production, when he was seized with sudden sickness, which soon gave symptoms of being fatal. In the month of January, 1594, being sensible that he could not recover, he received the Sacrament from the hands of his confessor and friend, S. Philip Neri. The last words he ever spoke had reference to the Church which he loved, and for which he had labored with such unremitting diligence and zeal. Calling to his bedside his only surviving son, he pointed out the means which had been supplied, and by whose bounty, of printing his hitherto unpublished works; and laid upon him a solemn charge to see it done as soon as possible, "for the glory of the Most High—such were his words—"and for the worship of His holy temples."

It is painful to think that these solemn words were utterly disregarded by his unworthy son, who squandered the money entrusted to the purpose, and sold besides whatever MSS. he could to the publishers of Venice. This final degradation, however, Palestrina himself did not live to witness. The fever terminated fatally on the 2nd of February, and the funeral train of the composer was swelled by the attendance of the most eminent musicians of Rome, whether writers, singers, or instrumentalists, together with immense crowds from the surrounding city and neighborhood, who assembled with one accord to do honor to his memory. A "Libera me, Domine," of his own composition, was sung by three choirs over his grave, and on his tomb was placed the inscription—

JOANNES—PETRUS—ALOYSIUS, MUSICÆ PRINCEPS.

We have little further to add. Indeed we fear lest, as it is, we may have trespassed too far on the patience of our readers. But our object has been twofold; first, the information of the ordinary reader, whose curiosity may have been raised by the frequent and conspicuous mention of a name he can hardly have failed to notice; and, secondly, a desire to induce the musical student to turn his attention to a school of writing which, for skilful construction, solemn expressiveness, and graceful sweetness, is equal to any purely vocal school that has since existed. Should we have, in any degree, succeeded in either of these two objects, we shall be content. Thus much, however, in regard to the latter. We must require, as a preliminary condition, that our author be not judged by the modern system, by the modern rules and conventionalisms of music; that the student be not induced to throw up his score at once on finding, what he assuredly will find, and what may at first jar upon his nerves; such things, we mean, as pure chord successions, without any, or with but little, preparation, and rarely tempered by chromatic tones; a sparing use of such combinations as to us of the modern school are most familiar; together with a frequent use of other things (such as rapid progressions to distant keys, etc.), which to us are inadmissible. We must stipulate that Palestrina's music be judged by a given standard; that it be borne in mind, that he had both the disadvantage of writing three hundred years ago, and also the advantage of writing, not in two modes only, as is the case with the moderns, but in twelve.

We subjoin a list of Palestrina's complete works (from Baini), together with the names of one or two modern publications above referred to, as being both ready of access, and containing some choice specimens of the master:—

Twelve books of Masses, for four, five and six voices.
Two others, in MS.

One ditto, for eight voices.

Two volumes of Motets, for four voices.

Five volumes of Motets, for five voices.

One volume of Offertories (58 pieces).

Two volumes of Litanies.

One volume of Litanies, in MS.

Three volumes of Motets, in MS.

One volume of Hymns for all holidays of the year.

One volume of Magnificats, for five and six voices.

One volume of Magnificats, for eight voices.

One volume of Lamentations.

Two or three volumes of Lamentations, published by Alder.

Two volumes of Madrigals, for four voices.

Two volumes of Sacred Madrigals, for five voices.

Selections from the above will be found in the "Cinq Muses" and "Vingt Motets," Paris, Launer; "Anthems and Services for Church Choirs," Burns; the first number of the Motett Society's publications, Chappel, Bond-street; a selection recently published by Novello; and also several detached pieces.

Emerson and his Lectures.

Many years ago Margaret Fuller wrote as follows concerning Emerson and his lectures:

"If only as a representative of the claims of individual culture in a nation which is prone to lay such stress on artificial organization and external results, Mr. Emerson would be invaluable here. History will inscribe his name as a father of his country, for he is one who pleads her cause against herself. If New England may be regarded as a chief mental focus to the New World, . . . we may hail as an auspicious omen the influence Mr. Emerson has there obtained, which is deep-rooted, increasing, and, over the younger portion of the community, far greater than that of any other person. . . . The audience that waited for years upon the lectures was never large, but it was select, and it was constant. Among the hearers were some who, though, attracted by the beauty of character and manner, they were willing to hear the speaker through, yet always went away discontented. They were accustomed to an artificial method, whose scaffolding could easily be retraced, and desired an obvious sequence of logical inferences. . . . Others were content to be benefited by a good influence without a strict analysis of its means. 'My wife says it is about the elevation of human nature, and so it seems to me,' was a fit reply to some of the critics. . . . Those who believed no truth could exist unless encased by the burrs of opinion went away utterly baffled. Sometimes they thought he was on their side; then presently would come something on the other. The partisan heard but once, and returned no more. But some there were—simple souls—whose life had been, perhaps, without clear light, yet still a search after truth for its own sake, who were able to receive what followed on the suggestion of a subject in a natural manner, as a stream of thought. These recognized, beneath the veil of words, the still small voice of conscience, the vestal fires of lone religious hours, and the mild teachings of the summer woods. The charm of elocution, too, was great. His general manner was that of the reader, occasionally rising into direct address or invocation in passages where tenderness or majesty demanded more energy. At such times both eye and voice called on a remote future to give a worthy reply; a future which shall manifest more largely the universal soul as it was then manifest to this soul. The tone of the voice was a grave body tone, full and sweet rather than sonorous, yet flexible and haunted by many modulations, as even instruments of wood and brass seem to become after they have been long played on with skill and taste; how much more the human voice! In the more expressive passages it uttered notes of silvery clearness, winning, yet still more commanding. The words uttered in those tones floated awhile above us, then took root in the memory like winged seed."

Verdi, Gluck, and Bach.

[From the London Orchestra].

The worship-music of Sebastian Bach may be said now to be beginning to assert its real influence over the minds and hearts of the people: and this movement in the popular taste will mark a new phase in the development of musical art, and will tend to Bach's undisputed sway and supremacy in the highest branch of musical composition: that specially designated for use in the sanctuary. It is a great mistake to describe his Passion music as an Oratorio, using this word in its modern sense. The historical accounts of the Holy Evangelists are the foremost of dramas in thought and conception, in their life-like and epic character, but they are immeasurably removed from the very best attempts by any Oratorio manufacturer, ancient or modern. They stand apart from all theories of ethics or æsthetics, all theoretic or imaginative results; and have nothing whatever to do with the Biblical romantic or heroic novel, or with that presentation of scriptural episodes which a care for the good and beautiful may have condensed or expanded for the purposes of some two hours' musical display and some innocent amusement. At a certain period of the ecclesiastical season these historical records of the Passion of our Lord are presented as a part of the course or cursus, and they have always been sung from time immemorial. England in her quarrel with the Catholic Church neglected, if she did not altogether banish, music from her people's services, and struck out the Passion-music from her ritual. Germany, on the other hand, made her Reformation the starting point of a fresh musical progress. Choir-singing in the vernacular was no new thing to her, and her church music was ever more in unison with the feeling of the people than that of Italy, France, Flanders, or England. The new spirit created the new style, and advance in technical skill and extension of the boundaries of true art received their impulses from the popular tide. Religious spirit preserved the use and employ of music in the sanctuary, and religion was the guardian angel and monitor at the right hand of the musician. Thus the influence of an unquestioned faith gave the individual, personal power and expression to the composer; and the solemn character of the service, its vernacular clothing, the introduction of the people's chorals, the school and city choirs, the amateur orchestras, bound him down to gravity of design and nobility of purpose, and kept him aloof from the prettiness and petty details of the secular play and the then growing musical opera. The simplicity and pathos of the evangelic records forbade any union with forms of music expressive of false conceptions and mere worldly interest.

The circle of the church seasons presented the leading incidents in scriptural history; and the musicians sought for increased power and new means to make them more and more attractive, more and more spiritually beautiful. Graces and ornaments in song, prettiness and elegance in instrumental execution, might please, but they could not elevate or exalt. The most serious subjects that could exercise the highest faculties of mind and soul called for grand ideas, and for the greatest number of such ideas. What was demanded was pleasure in worship, and not delight from mere artistic ends or social purposes. Hence the rise of that rich musical language heard in the productions of Sebastian Bach; the inexhaustible rhythm, the interweaving of three, four, or more of real melodies, the marvellous division of the choirs and orchestras, the constant employ of the double or extreme harmonies, the utter freedom from all harshness, the force and fire, the calm and repose, the tenderness and pathos, in fact the triumph of soul and heart over the mere mechanism and scientific outcome of the professor. His constant dependence upon whatsoever was lovely and pure led to that magnificence of subtlety and skill shown in every theme he touched. He was ever luminous, because ever looking at the light; ever lofty, because his thoughts were heavenward. His subjects were all true, teeming with beauty, and the source of all greatness in the heart of man. Here was the foundation—the only real foundation—for the highest results of art; and these principles are as strong now as in his day, as they were eighteen hundred years ago, or some four thousand years since. This insight of Bach into the mysteries of the spiritual world and its supernatural manifestations in this our lower sphere made him study and work until he acquired an unrivalled power over the harmonies of sound, and overwhelming range of expression. For splendor of language, perspicuity of subject, novelty of idea, grasp of the technical, and mastery over all the science of music, Bach has no equal; and yet all these high possessions are as nothing in comparison with the sweetness, love, and affection—the angelic tenderness of his spirit. Bach must ever be approached with all due reverence, and not without due preparation. To acquire but the smallest perception of what is so eminently beautiful, so thoroughly lovely and saintlike, there must be the necessary gradations, progresses, and transformations. We are now listening to the great artist; the deepest and most profound intellect; the keenest wit; the perfect master who never left anything unfinished or untold? What more? If we have not his impulses and imaginings, his love and his faith, they are but so many pictures, tales that are told; we attain not to his meaning, and more than half his work is thrown away upon us. We must partake of his spirit and sympathize with his affections; then, and then only can we fully enter into his joy of the beautiful, and pronounce him to be altogether noble and good.

Every great man has his own ways, and it is for us to accept them and be thankful. Consummate knowledge treads no ordinary path. Bach's choruses have been thought to be rather rough work, and decidedly too short for the true oratorical form. When Bach writes his dialectic chorus, his contrapuntal commentary on the particular and important situation, no composer can be more expansive, argumentative, solid, or brilliant. In his renderings of the historical records he has his characters in the history—Our Saviour and his disciples; the Jews and their Bishops; Archbishops, and the like; the Roman Governor and his guards; and these real personages form his drama; and when the disciples or the soldiers cry out, they are not made to sing fugues or dilate upon musical themes, or show off in long divisions and answers in the authentic and plagal—mere mannerisms. They are human creatures, and treated as disciples and soldiers; they shout out like men in such situations, say their say, and are silent. In all the historic portions of the Passione of Bach, Bach has done what Gluck attempted to do in 1770, just forty years after Bach. Gluck congratulated himself that he had reduced music to its real function in the drama; that of not interrupting action, but that of aiding expression and adding to the intensity of the situation. "I forge," he said, "that I am a musician, that I may contemplate only the personages of the drama." This is exactly what Bach did; but then he made no fuss about it, and never wrote an "Orpheus," and "Alceste." He established the highest form of the musical drama—so new and so true that people went to sleep over it for more than a hundred years; and it is just now forty years since Mendelssohn woke up Germany to the fact. Gluck's rule was not to stop the action that the auditors might listen to song or chorus merely. Bach's rule was to do what was right and keep the straight road. Gluck took the historical myth and treated it as a solemn truth. He made people cry over it. But it is easy enough to make people cry; a good cry is supposed to stand for exquisite taste and the highest critical faculty. Bach held a pure sympathy with the Evangelist—he shared his emotion and his thought; his spirit was present at the Brook, the Garden, the Palace, the Judgment Hall, and Mount Calvary. What words can duly represent such a spirit, or its true and mighty operations! His great power was in the invention and union of melodies, or what is known as florid counterpoint. Above this great power of unsurpassed technical excellence was the transcendent gift of imbuing all he wrote with the expression of his saintlike spirit. He had keen eyesight, but still deeper heart sight.

The Chorals in the "Passione" excite the liveliest interest; but what a satire are they upon the undevout and depressing modern hymn tunes with which musicians are in these times trying to tickle the ears of the poor people that go to church to hear modern church music! And then composers think they are performing feats of virtuosity, and doing something highly meritorious, and for the well being of metrical hymnody! We have had more than enough of this sort of no thought and crude conception, and we rejoice to find how our repeatedly expressed opinions on the state of modern music and present modes of study have been confirmed by the pen of the justly far-famed Verdi.[1] He had been invited to take the office of Director of the Naples Conservatoire. This he declined, his labors not admitting its acceptance. But he recommends to begin at the beginning, and learn first to write church music, to study Palestrina, and follow the examples of Scarlatti, Durante, Leo, and Marcello. "Learn," says this highly-gifted artist, "to compose with freedom, to dispose the parts naturally, and to modulate without affectation. Study the recitative, attend to this; and always write in good faith. Avoid the fascination of the orchestra, eschew florid harmony, and abhor all chords of the diminished seventh. Lastly, determine to know nothing of 'the music of the future.'" Undoubtedly good warning and excellent advice. No one wants to share the internal feelings and desires of half-hatched composers which in these days are impetuous, impatient, and implacable; and those of our young professors who may possess artistic organizations will do well to ponder over this memorandum of a great (!) musician who has made his mark in his day and generation, and take them fully to heart. Verdi does not mention Bach, but he points out the way Bach trod, and the means by which others may walk in his steps. Bach's early works, as also Beethoven's, at the most only give promise of future excellence. Now, each stands in the harmonical heavens, bright and brilliant stars for inferior manifestations to watch and to worship.

At present there is no possible opportunity of hearing the music of Bach in its right and fitting place; but it is to be hoped that the Great Hall for Music and Art at South Kensington may not be closed on the Sundays. To foster and encourage music six days in the week and close the doors of this magnificent building on the seventh is worse than an act of mere Puritanism; it is rampant Vandalism. South Kensington Hall is the only place worthy of the music of Bach out of a cathedral; and until Westminster Abbey be open for it we trust that it may be there heard. But the people must join in the chorals. Until the congregation take part in the rendering of this mighty work, it will remain a performance, a concert, and this it will not bear.

The History of Music.

TWELFTH LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

(Reported for the Advertiser.)

An unusually large audience attended the lecture on Saturday, attracted in no small degree probably by the interest of the subject—Handel and Bach. In the latter, said Mr. Paine, is to be found the culmination of Protestant church music, as in the former sacred and secular music were reconciled in the form of the Oratorio. Having traced briefly the steps by which the world was prepared for the coming of these two great masters, Mr. Paine gave an outline of their history. It is singular that they were both Saxons and were so nearly contemporaneous in their birth, Handel being the older by seventeen days. We need not give even a sketch of this part of the lecture, as the main facts in the lives of both are so well known. The contrast in their characters was very marked. Handel left home at an early age to seek his fortune, and was all his life engaged in turmoil and strife for the recognition of his talents. Bach lived a quiet and uneventful life, striving to do his duty faithfully wherever his lot was cast, and quitting a humble for a higher and more extended sphere of usefulness only when invited to do so. Handel never married, died rich, and lies in Westminster Abbey. Bach married early, brought up a large family of children, died poor, and lies no one knows where. Handel travelled extensively, was conscious of his talents and was ambitious of the world's esteem. Bach, although he must have known that he was the greatest organ virtuoso in the world, was contented wherever he might be, and, so far as is known, never had a wish to set his foot in a foreign land.

Handel's education and genius enabled him to become a universal master. He united in his music the intellectual and creative power and the learning of the German, the melodious vocalization of the Italian, and the clear, solid and simple expression of the English. His long service in the school of dramatic composition prepared the way naturally for the union of a high and devout religious feeling, a noble and elevated style and a beautiful and attractive form in the oratorios of a later period of his life. An interesting parallel was drawn between Handel and Shakespeare. The early comedies of the latter correspond to the operas of the former, while Shakespeare's tragedies and Handel's oratorios are the natural outgrowth of the forms which preceded them. And just as in the lifetime of Shakespeare his introduction of his keen wit into tragedy was condemned, so was the use of the air in Handel's oratorios. The earlier works of Shakespeare have been revived and are performed with success. It has been predicted that Handel's operas, now almost forgotten and never performed, will also be revived. We have not space to follow the lecturer through his analysis of Handel's music. An illustration was given of one of his styles, a most beautiful soprano aria from the opera of "Rodelinda," composed in 1725.

Bach was misunderstood even by his sons and disciples, but the effort at reviving his works has been so industriously carried out, that his music has come to be better known and more admired. It is but twenty-five years since his Passion Music according to St. Matthew was performed for the first time since his death. Mr. Paine spoke of him as the greatest sacred composer and the most intellectual musician who ever lived. Those who find his music cold and passionless are ignorant of his style. Handel's music has become antiquated, because he incorporated into it some conventionalities of the prevailing schools. Bach's music cannot grow antiquated. As a harmonist and contrapuntist, he stands pre-eminent among all who ever lived, and he deserves to receive the credit of having set on foot the great movement in the improvement of instrumentation to which Beethoven contributed so much. These two, Bach and Beethoven, were the most deeply subjective of all musicians. In conclusion, a tenor solo from the St. Matthew Passion music, with a quartet in place of the chorus, was sung by Dr. Langmaid.

THIRTEENTH LECTURE, MARCH 4.

The subject of the thirteenth lecture of the course on Saturday last was the progress of instrumental music after John Sebastian Bach, especially under his son Emanuel Bach, and Haydn. The constant tendency of musical growth, he remarked, was from objective to subjective. From the mediæval church music sprang the Opera, and from the Opera resulted the development of the instrumental art. No earlier age could have produced a Beethoven. From the school of church music of the middle ages was developed the vocal art which admitted of the introduction of the passions. The art of instrumental music was an offshoot from this and could not be at once emancipated from its bonds. It was only when the instrumental music was made to combine the polyphonic form of ancient counterpoint with the freedom of more modern song, the sacred and secular, the solid and the beautiful, that it reached its highest excellence. Bach was the true founder of modern instrumental music. His sons and disciples had only left to them to follow the course which he had prophetically marked out. In analyzing the old toccatas and fugues we are first struck by their purely formal character. They consist of a succession of musical sounds without the charm of a poetical feeling. This is only natural. The dry details must be first mastered before poetic genius can clothe its thoughts in words and sounds of beauty. The fugue may be compared to the Gothic cathedral of the middle age. We see the beauty of this part and that, and we admire the learning of the architect, but it is presumptuous in all but a few close students to say that they fully understand the idea that was in the architect's mind. In Bach's music we can trace his individuality, even in his most learned compositions. He shows us that he was a true poet. Von Weber calls him a romantic master and declares that it is his romantic power which gives him his hold upon musical people.

Bach's instrumental music may be divided into four classes,—his church music for organs; his sacred music for home, in which is to be included the most of his compositions for piano and violin, and the "Well-Tempered Clavier" is of this class; his lighter secular pieces, and his concert music, concertos, sonatas, &c. In the last class he shows the most of the modern thematic mode of treatment. His Italian Concerto is of this character. Mr. Paine played two movements from the last-named position, to the great delight of the audience. The finale especially gave much pleasure.

The lecturer then gave an interesting history of the origin and growth of the Sonata and the Symphony before the time of Bach, and followed it with sketches of the lives of Emanuel Bach and Haydn. The former he regarded as having possessed but a tithe of his father's genius, and yet as having played a very important part in the development of instrumental music. His skill at improvisation and the contact with elegant society both imparted a sort of freedom and finish of style, which were of great importance at the time. Mozart and Haydn both looked up to him as a master in his way, and his work on the clavier is still an authority, as his rules are still at the foundation of all correct playing of the piano-forte. A thoroughly delightful Rondo by Emanuel Bach was played by Mr. Paine, to illustrate the freedom and beauty of his style of composition. Mr. Paine regards Haydn as an unconscious reformer. His joyous disposition is traceable through all his writings, and yet there are few composers who show a more steady and material improvement, whose later works are more superior to their earlier ones, than Haydn. In his earlier Symphonies—of which he wrote the astonishing number of one hundred and nineteen—he had but three movements,—a slow movement between two fast ones. In the later Symphonies he introduced the Minuet, and imparted to it gaiety and jollity that it did not possess as the stately dance of elegant society. His operas, nineteen in number, are insignificant. His sacred music is deficient in deep, religious feeling. He was greatest in his quartets and trios. His use of the free thematic mode of treating his subject was dwelt upon by Mr. Paine, who defined the distinction between that mode and strict imitative counterpoint, which we are compelled to omit, with much else that was interesting in the lecture. The influence of Mozart's happy faculty of instrumentation is distinctly observable in Haydn's later works. In conclusion Mr. Paine played one movement from one of Haydn's later Sonatas.

FOURTEENTH LECTURE.

(Reported for the Boston Journal.)

Mr. Paine's theme on Saturday was Gluck and Mozart, and the Modern Opera.

Before the advent of Gluck and Mozart, said the lecturer, the opera in Italy, France and Germany had developed certain national characteristics which had not yet reached their ultimate ideal in either country. The Italian opera had retrograded rather than progressed from the position held by Scarlatti and his best followers. The Hamburg opera, under Keiand others, was a short-lived attempt to establish a national German opera. Its brilliant star suddenly vanished from the musical horizon, and Germany, like all the rest of Europe, except France, was blinded for a time by the full light of the Italian opera. In France, however, a genuine musical drama had arisen under Lully and Rameau, and subsequently under Philidor and Gretry, who moulded the lighter opera into a fully rounded artistic form, thanks, after all, to the influence of the Italians, who had introduced Pergolesi's "Serva Padrona" with such wonderful effect. In the first stages of growth, the French comic opera, which emanated from the vaudeville and chanson, was built up by composers like Rousseau and Duni, Monsigny and Philidor, who wrote music more like dilettanti than trained musicians. It was reserved for Gretry to complete this branch and stand as the true representative of the national character of the French in the field of dramatic music. Meanwhile the tragic or grand opera of Lully and Rameau continued in existence, though the interest of the public centred in the comic opera, but the time was approaching when new life was to be infused into it, not by a son of the soil, but by a foreigner.

Christopher Willibald Ritter von Gluck was born in Weidenwang, in Upper Pfalz, on the 2d of July, 1714. His talent for music was evinced at an early age, and he was encouraged in his musical studies by the noble Viennese family of Lobkowitz. He became chamber musician for Prince Melzi of Lombardy, and at Milan received musical instruction from Sammartini. After a four years' course of study, he composed his first opera, "Artaserse," which was brought out at Milan with great success in 1741. He was forthwith invited to compose other works for Milan, Turin, Cremona and Venice, and in 1745 accompanied Prince Lobkowitz to London and Paris, where he brought out several operas. He did not find English soil favorable to his art, for the Italians had absolute control there. During his stay in London he made the acquaintance of Handel, whose music made a lasting impression upon him, and who consoled him for his want of success in England with the remark: "You have taken too much trouble with your opera for this place, for Englishmen require anything to be beaten out on drum-heads to please them." Gluck went to Vienna, where he was appointed chapel-master of the royal opera in 1754, a position he continued to hold ten years, during which time he composed a number of operas, making, also, a journey to Rome, where he was made a Chevalier by the Pope. It was not until nearly the close of his career as Chapel-master at Vienna that he disclosed to the public his plan of a reform in dramatic music. It was the production of his "Orpheus," in 1762, that marked the beginning of this new and eventful period in his life. Hitherto he had followed the beaten path of the Italian opera. Even after this date he composed more or less in the traditional Italian style, and it was not before his opera of "Alceste" appeared, in 1769, that he turned entirely aside from the old course, henceforth to obey no master but himself. Finding Vienna unfavorable to the development of his plan of reform, he went to Paris in 1773, where he brought out his "Iphigenia in Aulide" a year later. The battles between the admirers of the comic opera, or buffonists, and the adherents of Lully and Rameau, or anti-buffonists, were renewed with fiercer fury than ever. The old French opera party found a champion in Gluck. The latter gave equal prominence to the declamation and action of the play, but his recitatives and airs were far more musical than those of the French masters, and the orchestra was employed far more independently and artistically. He did not make the pomp and glitter of the stage the chief attraction, but the spectacle was made to take a subordinate place in the total effect of the drama. The ballet was never introduced except to heighten the dramatic effect and give characteristic expression to the action of the play. Piccini was secured to head the Italian party, and seemed to triumph for a while, but Gluck won a final victory with his "Iphigenia in Tauride," produced in 1779. Piccini also composed an opera on the same subject, but Gluck had carried the day, and German opera had for the first time in history achieved a triumph over Italian and French music. It was not long after this that the French claimed Gluck as a national composer.

Mr. Paine gave an interesting analysis of Gluck's style and contrasted it with Mozart's. If Gluck's intelligence had embraced the musical comprehension of Handel or Scarlatti, he would have forestalled Mozart as an opera composer. He did improve the principal forms of the opera, the recitative and air, but it was more like leading them back to the older and purer style. He approached the spirit of the Greek ideal. Gluck's thoughts, evidently, did not flow easily and spontaneously. He was not well skilled in polyphonic writing. This is plainly evident in those places where the several dramatic characters are made to declaim or sing in concert with each other. He then found it difficult to preserve the musical individuality of each. Herein it was that Mozart showed himself to be the greatest of all masters. The characters of Mozart's operas are musically-dramatic conceptions, while Gluck's are poetic-dramatic productions, merely colored or more highly animated by music. Gluck painted over the naked drawing, but the lines still show through. Mozart conceived them as identical, and with him they had no separate existence. Gluck divided the musical world into two parties, which Mozart, through his universal genius reunited, but which have been shattered again in this generation by Wagner and his followers. This wide breach is the result of bringing theoretical questions into the foreground by means of polemical writings, of trying to institute reforms through the intellect rather than by the spontaneous and gradual growth of concrete ideas and long experience.

Gluck was not the only direct forerunner of Mozart in the field of opera among his countrymen, independently of the Italians. In the latter half of the 18th century the German opéra arose. This form of musical drama was suggested by the French comic opera. It was called into life by John Adam Hiller (1728-1804), and the most prominent of its other composers were Carl Ditters von Dittersdorf, Wenzel Müller, Joseph Weigl, Leopold Haseman, Peter Von Winter (who was one of the best of this class), Holzhauser, Wöfl, Zumbach, Himmel, John Andre, George Benda and John Frederick Reichardt. The latter was the most prominent of the group.

The concluding part of the lecture was devoted to a most interesting account of Mozart, with some remarks concerning his influence upon music. Mozart was born Jan. 27, 1756, at Salzburg in Austria. His musical faculty was displayed almost in infancy. At the age of four years he composed some little pieces. Two years later he began to compose for instruments, and his first opera "La Finta Semplice," was composed when he was only twelve years old. Before he was 21 years old he had composed no less than 35 symphonies, 32 orchestral compositions of various kinds, serenades, divertimentos and pieces for wind instruments, 14 string quartets, 1 trio, 1 quintet, and 20 concertos for solo piano or violin with orchestral accompaniment. From the age of twelve to twenty-five he also composed 20 masses and 30 other sacred compositions.

Mozart is rightfully considered as the universal master. This unparalleled universality is not only displayed in his complete mastery of every kind of musical composition, vocal and instrumental, from a popular song to a grand symphony, from a simple dance to a solemn requiem, but in the rare adaptation of different national peculiarities of style to his own individuality. It was his mission to unite and beautify the national elements of music, which hitherto had remained apart. European music attained its concentration, for the first time in history, in his works.

The musical illustrations accompanying the lecture comprised an Aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulide" and another from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," both sung by Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, and the playing by Mr. Paine of a minuet composed by Mozart at the age of four years.

Music Abroad.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The first concert of the season took place at St. James's Hall, with this somewhat peculiar programme:

Symphony in D (first time).....Gounod.
New Song, "There is a green hill far away" (first time).
Mr. Bentley.....Gounod.
Sinfonietta (first time).....Gounod.
Scene, "Far greater in his lowly state" (Irene). Miss Edith Wynne.....Gounod.
Concerto for Violin. Violin, Herr Joachim Mendelssohn.
Symphony in C minor (in compliance with the wish of the donor of the Bust of Beethoven).....Beethoven.
Scene, "My child has fled" (Robin Hood). Mr. Bentley.
G. A. Macfarren.
Duo, "Crudel perche." Miss Edith Wynne and Mr.
Bentley.....Mozart.
Overture, "The Ruler of the Spirits".....Weber.

Mons Gounod has accepted the invitation to direct the performance of his own works.

N.B.—The Subscribers are respectfully solicited to be in their places by a quarter to eight o'clock.

The Bust of Beethoven, lately presented to the Philharmonic Society will be exhibited at this Concert.

Whereupon the Musical World (March 4) comments:

M. Charles Gounod has been in England during the war, and he, we need not say, is a distinguished guest. After our fashion and to the extent of our light, we honor M. Gounod. His greatest opera is frequently heard in English lyric theatres, and always commands a "house;" his songs are encored in English concert-rooms; and his melodies are trotted, and ground, and whistled in English streets. Everybody knows M. Gounod; and looks upon him not simply as a famous man, but also as a pleasant acquaintance from whom much pleasure has been derived. Of course, therefore, a general desire to do him honor pervades the community; but, unhappily, the knack of carrying out that desire in a proper way seems wanting on every hand. In certain quarters no effort has been made to carry it out at all; and in other efforts has only resulted in grievous blundering. We can understand those, who, like the Director of the Monday Popular Concerts, have ignored M. Gounod altogether. That amounts to a frank confession of inability to carry out any fitting recognition of his presence, and is both honest and straightforward. At the Crystal Palace the managers have been less discreet, and, in honor of M. Gounod, have played the overture to Mireille and the ballet music of Faust, putting the last at the far end of the programme, to serve the purpose of an "out-voluntary!" Mr. Henry Leslie, by way of acknowledging M. Gounod's presence at one of his concerts, actually inserted "Nassareth" in the evening's scheme! But it has been reserved for the Philharmonic Society to reach the climax of mistaken homage. The well-meaning directors of that time-honored institution make much, in their English way, of M. Gounod, and, doubtless, imagine the programme of their forthcoming concert to be a model tribute. What is it in fact? First of all, M. Gounod and Beethoven are put on the pedestal together; the living being there in the flesh—the dead in plaster of Paris. The result need not be told; for M. Gounod, famous though he be, is not a Beethoven. Next, the "C minor" symphony occupies the place of honor. M. Gounod's symphony in D opening the concert, and serving to cover the noise made by late arrivals. Lastly, not even a moiety of the programme is given up to the French composer, Mendelssohn's violin Concerto and Herr Joachim being introduced just where both united can put M. Gounod out of mind. But what does the following "N.B." mean?—"Subscribers are respectfully solicited to be in their places by a quarter to eight o'clock." Does it mean that M. Gounod will receive a grand ovation from a waiting and admiring crowd?—or does it signify merely that some of the Royal Family are expected?

BACH'S PASSION MUSIC. Mr. Barnby (says the Musical World, Feb. 25) is apparently resolved to make J. S. Bach's setting of the Passion according to St. Matthew an annual feature at his Oratorio Concerts:

It was the Passion of St. Matthew with which the Oratorio Concerts were "inaugurated" the other evening; and a more promising beginning of a new season (the third) of these sterling entertainments could hardly have been desired. Last year the oratorio was given at Exeter Hall; this time St. James's Hall was the arena. Without entering into any argument about the antagonistic claims of the two buildings, as fitted for the purposes of music, we may unhesitatingly affirm that the second performance of the Passion was far superior to the first. This is all to the credit of Mr. Barnby, whose endeavors to obtain as good a general execution as possible, without the advantage of such unlimited preparation as conventional conductors enjoy, deserve hearty recognition. How arduous was the task he had set himself musicians need not be told. But he approached it undaunted, and success in a great measure may justly be said to have rewarded his spirited and praiseworthy efforts. That all the choruses—to the clear and emphatic utterance of some of which, the double choruses especially, the larger accommodation afforded by the Exeter Hall orchestra is, for evident reasons, more favorable—were equally well done, it would be untrue to say. Nevertheless, the average performance was singularly effective; and, on the whole, we have never heard the opening double-chorus, "Come, ye daughters, weep with me"—to name the most elaborate and trying of them all—go so smoothly and with such precision. The antiphonal passages, where Zion exhorts and the faithful inquiringly respond, were admirably brought out; while the touching Lutheran choral ("O Lamm Gottes unschuldig"), which firmly pursues its course above all the intricate combinations of vocal and instrumental harmony, was heard throughout as if there had been nothing that could interfere with its distinct enunciation. After this successful dealing with what, although the oratorio begins with it, is the severest test of efficiency on the part both of singers and players, there was little reason to be apprehensive about the sequel. That the double-chorus, "Have lightnings and thunders in clouds disappeared?"—which, according to Mr. Barnby's arrangements, ends the first part—produced, as at Exeter Hall last year, the effect of the evening, may easily be credited; and yet we must again protest against the omission of the splendid and nobly wrought out chorus, "O man, thy heavy sin lament," which, according to Bach's own score, succeeds it. Any true lover of Bach's music would greatly prefer having this chorus retained to hearing its immediate precursor twice over, as was the case the other night. Without entering into further details, we must be content to add that the chorals, almost without exception, were sung in a manner which did infinite credit to Mr. Barnby's Choir, and that the double-chorus, "In tears of grief we here recline," which brings the scene at the sepulchre and the oratorio itself to an end—perhaps the loveliest and most expressive piece of all—was given to perfection.

A line must suffice to say that the recitatives and solos in which the oratorio of the Passion is so rich could scarcely have been confided to artists more competent to do them justice than Mme. Rudersdorff (soprano), Madame Patey (contralto), Mr. Cummings (tenor), and Herr Stockhausen (bass)—all practiced musicians. We were glad to find the pathetic air, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord," assigned last year to a soprano, now restored to the voice for which it was originally meant—a contralto. The violin obbligato accompaniment to this air is as striking and appropriate in its way as that to the "Benedictus" in Beethoven's Second Mass. It could hardly have been better played than by Herr Pollitzer (leader of the orchestra); nor could the pianoforte accompaniment to those recitatives indicated in the score by "figured basses" have been entrusted to one more able to handle them discreetly than Signor Randerger. In conclusion, we do not see why, when the Passions Music is performed in a concert room, there should be more curtailment than is found absolutely necessary. If the original practice of having a sermon between the two parts into which the oratorio is divided were adopted, the case would be different. But this, like the singing of the tunes of the chorals by the congregation, appertains exclusively to the Church; and as Bach's great Protestant music seems very unlikely, at any rate in the present time, to be heard in one of our English churches, and as we are compelled in order to hear it at all, to go to a concert room, we confess we should like to hear it as nearly as possible in its integrity.

We read also in the Choir of March 4:

The performance of Bach's Passions Music in Westminster Abbey, which we were enabled to announce a fortnight ago, will take place on the evening of Maundy Thursday, April 6th, when a sermon will be preached by the Dean. We are not aware whether it is intended to invite all who are present to join in the chorals, and thus completely to fulfil the composer's intention; but it is obvious that such a proceeding would greatly intensify the effect of the sublime music and render it still more worthy of the solemn occasion on which for the first time it will be heard within the walls of an English church. If the words and the melody of the chorals were printed on a card and supplied to each person, it would be comparatively easy to obtain that grand burst of unison, which is the only adequate fulfilment of the noble design. To Mr. Barnby no slight honor is due for having rendered such a project possible of execution, and it is to be presumed that the work will be produced under his direction.

MUNICH.—The following little bit of chit-chat was forwarded by a correspondent, a short time since, to the Neue Wiener Tageblatt:—"In our Athens here on the Isar, the most stupendous events seem destined to succeed each other in marvellously rapid succession. Scarcely has the initiative of the King to restore the Imperial dignity become an established fact before another subject forms the topic of every conversation. It is asserted that Richard Wagner, the hermit of the Lake of Lucerne, is about to emerge from the obscurity of his present middle-class station, and enter the ranks of Bavarian barons. When, a few weeks ago, the report was spread through the city that the Baron von Perfall, the Intendant of the Court Theatres, and author of the deficit of 500,000 florins, was to be appointed Master of the Ceremonies, while Richard Wagner was to succeed him as Intendant-General of the Theatres Royal, a cry of horror convulsed our aristocratic salons. The question how and whether the new Intendant-General's lady, Wagner's wife, Mme. Cosima, Liszt's daughter, and the divorced wife of Herr von Bülow, should be received and treated, became the aristocratic prize topic of the day. Just as the consternation of our thorough-bred nobility broke through all the limits of the silence and forbearance prescribed by Court etiquette itself, when, at the production of Tristan und Isolde, Ludwig II. gave the composer, Wagner, a place in his box, intended only for crowned heads, and the musician, a commoner, had the hardihood, in reply to the uproarious acclamations of the public, to bow from the 'King's Box' afore-said, so now, when, by his appointment as Intendant-General, he would have the right to breathe the air of the Court, the indignation of the insulted lords-in-waiting knew no bounds. Careless of the Royal displeasure, the nobility were firmly resolved to ignore both Wagner and his wife, since—for so it was whispered—the man who made parliamentary speeches upon the Dresden barricades, and regarded the King of Bavaria's private purse as a milch cow, and the married lady who played the part of carrier-pigeon between Wagner, then her idolized friend, and the King of Bavaria, who glowed with enthusiasm for him, when Wagner had to yield to the bitter feeling of numerous fanatics, and retire, with an annual life pension of 7000 florins into the paradise-like exile provided for him on the banks of the Lake of Lucerne by his Royal patron—the married lady who, when Wagner found himself in a pecuniary fix, which by the way he does pretty frequently, rattled triumphantly, in full daylight, from the Royal palace with two cabs, each of which carried 20 sacks of 1000 florins—such persons could not be fit associates for aristocratic society. Ludwig II. is too keen, as everybody is aware, not soon to know perfectly well the reason which had thrown the nobility of his Court and capital into such a state of excitement. Accustomed, however, since his accession, to act only in accordance with his own will, he is said to have determined, in order to alleviate the wound which the presumption fostered by the privilege of birth has inflicted upon the plebeian prince of music, to give the latter the Commander's Cross of the Bavarian Order of the Crown, which confers noble rank on the person who receives it; but it is doubted whether Wagner will accept it any more than the title of Intendant-General, which has been several times offered to, and as often refused by, him."

LEIPZIG.—At the sixteenth Gewandhaus Concert, Herr Ferdinand Hiller appeared in the two-fold capacity of composer and executant. As the former, he contributed a "Suite for Piano-forte," two Songs for Chorus of Female Voices, and an overture to Schiller's Demetrius. The orchestra performed Bach's F major Toccata, arranged for orchestra, by Easer, and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. The programme included, also, a setting by Rheinberger, for female chorus with harp, of the Eighty-third Psalm.

END OF THE VOLUME.—The present Number completes VOLUME XXX of our Journal, and the Nineteenth Year of its existence. Subscribers for the past year hereby receive one number extra (No. 27, Vol. XXIX). This is in order that the new year of the Journal may begin, as usual, in April.

TITLE PAGE and INDEX for the past two years (Vols. XXIX and XXX) will be found in the next number.

"Preacher Verdi."

We copy on another page, from the London Orchestra, a just appreciation of the dramatic qualities of Bach's Passion Music. How much weight the opinion of the writer gains, however, by bringing into contact such extremes as Bach and Verdi, with such complimentary allusion to the latter, the reader may judge for himself. In our last number we printed Signor Verdi's letter, which furnished the occasion for coupling his name with the great names of Bach and Gluck in the title of the article referred to. The reflection which that letter naturally awakened in the mind of many a thoughtful music-lover, is very well expressed in a leading editorial of the Musical World (London) under the above heading, which we here give entire:

Our business just now is not to inquire whether it be true that "the greater the sinner the greater the saint." We are, however, concerned to know that powerful preachers of the Right are most readily found among those who have been doers of the Wrong. The fact was recognized of old—recognized, for example, when Saul the persecutor was thought worth converting by a miracle into a Christian apostle; and when a Magdalene became what the Record would call "a mother in Israel." Profane history supplies a crowd of similar illustrations. Who enforced sanctity and austerity but the once free-living Thomas à Beckett? Who made himself a protest against ambition but the once mighty Emperor Charles V.? Who showed the pilgrim's path to heaven but the once "terrible tinker" from whom exhaled an odour of hell? Who—but why go on, when the reader can bring from the storehouse of memory, even if he have read nothing since his school-days, a string of examples equally pertinent? The underlying principle is philosophically true; is axiomatic in fact; and that quite apart from considerations of contrast. A naked maniac, "clothed and in his right mind," cannot but witness strongly to the blessings of a sound intellect and a good tailor; but there is an element in cases like those we have quoted which lies above and beyond contrast. He can best show the road through a swamp who has found out by dirty experience where the mud lies deepest; and he most powerfully enforces morality who has endured the results of scorning it. Abraham, in the parable, was wise when he declined sending an angel-missionary to the brothers of Dives. "They have Moses and the Prophets," said the venerable patriarch; who might have added, "and Moses and the Prophet have very good reason to know where humanity is weakest."

Bearing all this in mind, how heartily ought the letter of Signor Verdi, which appears on another page, to be welcomed! Here, indeed, is a startling phenomenon. The composer of La Traviata and Il Trovatore, the free and easy Verdi, who, in the paths of music, all his life long, has gone where he pleased (by the shortest way), and done what he liked—he, the libertine of art, suddenly comes before us, grave as an academical professor, wearing a scholastic dress, and laden with the contrapuntal studies of the old masters! "Is Saul also among the prophets?" Indeed he is, and, pray, let us be silent when he speaks. What things can Signor Verdi not tell us about quicksands, and shoals, and hidden rocks! For years he floundered among the first, got aground on the second, and crashed against the third; all the time with colors flying, and a great appearance of enjoyment. But Signor Verdi was really laying up a store of experiences on behalf of our generation; and in his letter to the Neapolitan Conservatoire, he begins to utter them. Silence, pray, silence, for the new preacher of the musical Right!

Here we take the Verdian letter as read, and, having allowed the reader time to recover, beg to ask what he thinks of it. A philosopher would answer,—"It is quite in accordance with precedent. Les extrêmes se touchent. Signor Verdi, the musician of the day, points to the musicians of bygone years, and even raises the ghost of the venerable Palestrina. Knowing nothing of fugue himself, he would have others saturated with fugues. And having exhausted the capacity of the 'diminished seventh,' he warns everybody to keep away from that refuge of the incapable. There is nothing to be surprised at in this. It accords with the nature of things." Thus our philosopher;—but we do not share his indifference. Signor Verdi, preaching scholasticism in music, is a portent suggesting much. He is, moreover, a warning to composers captivated by the loose artistic habits of the day, in whose ear he says—"Thus will it be with you in the end, though you are never likely to furnish such a signal example of error as myself." We surely needed some such caution, and could not have had a better. Signor Verdi, like another "pillar of salt," stands forevermore a monument of terrible import to those who would turn their faces toward the Sodom of the "diminished seventh." Let our would-be composers take heed, and apply themselves to the "old masters," instead of scribbling down incoherence and calling it "ideality." Oh! if they but would, what reason should we all have for thankfulness! Little may flow from their communion with the masterminds; but, at any rate, the world would be spared their "ideality." For the chance of this, thanks, Signor Verdi, thanks!

Concerts.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Musical Association. The programme for Thursday Afternoon, March 9, was the following:

Overture to "Medea".....Bargiel.
Aria, (Contralto): "Grief and Pain," ("Buss und Reu"), from the St. Matthew Passion Music. (Orchestral accompaniments completed by Robert Franz). J. S. Bach.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.
Symphony in G, [No. 12, Breitkopf and Haertel ed.] Haydn.
Overture to the Hindoo legend "Sakuntala," [Second time].....Goldmark.
Songs:
a.] "Son confus pastorella," arranged by Robert Franz from the Opera "Poro".....Handel.
b.] Goethe's Mailed: "Zwischen Weizen und Korn," etc.....Franz.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.
Overture to "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.

We do not think that many present found themselves preferring the "Medea" Overture of Bargiel to that by Cherubini in the preceding concert. A more ambitious work it is, employing the increased modern means of sonority and climax, and not without a certain earnestness and grandeur, an impressive gloom of tragic coloring belonging to the subject; but far less intrinsically musical, less inspired, less beautiful than the more unpretending, quiet, thoroughly poetic introduction by the older master. It is certainly one of the best specimens we have yet had of the orchestral compositions of the new men, and was well worth a hearing. It had been carefully rehearsed (for it is very difficult), and went well with the exception of some rather dubious blending of the trombones in the strange chords they have to hold near the beginning.

Between this and the other sombre, straining Overture by Goldmark, (which, however, rather gains in favor upon repetition), the supremely happy and spontaneous little Symphony in G, by Haydn, let in a flood of exhilarating sunshine. It was indeed inspiring, and seldom is the blessing of sincere, consummate Art, the power of its presence in little things as well as great, better realized than it was then. The large and noble and religious melody of the slow movement seems to hallow with a purer light the frolic joy of the quick movements. The Minuet and Trio are of the most perfect of their kind. Mendelssohn never came so fully out of himself and composed so objectively as in that really dramatic Overture to "Ruy Blas," of which one is not likely soon to become weary. Both this and the Symphony were uncommonly well played.

The Aria from the Passion Music (sung for the first time in Boston) was not, of course, introduced with the expectation that it would become at once "popular," but because of its intrinsic beauty and significance, and because it is well to use the opportunity of so select and impressive an audience, now and then, to familiarize the ear and mind and heart somewhat with a few of these profoundly sweet and tender melodies, in order to prepare the way for that performance and appreciation of the entire Passion Music which we must have here before long. Mrs. BARRY, taking it at short notice (owing to the illness of Miss Sterling), and with only one chance of rehearsal with the orchestra, sang perhaps with a little less of freedom than she would have sung some other things,—i.e., with a seemingly anxious fidelity,—but she was in good voice, and the style, conception, spirit were all right, so that it made upon the whole an excellent impression. What could be more beautiful or more expressive than the very simple, touching accompaniment which Bach has given both to the wonderful introductory Recitative: "Thou dear Redeemer" and to the Aria itself? Nothing but two flutes, sobbing in thirds and sixths, besides the quartet of strings! And even this Quartet is written out by Robert Franz from the mere ciphered Bass of Bach. But here every note tells, full of meaning and of feeling. But the two flutes cease their even flow in the second part of the Air, at the words: "Fall, ye drops, fall faster, faster, freely from mine eyes, like rain," and answer each other in a little imitative staccato figure, Canon-like. The lovely Aria by Handel, heard here last year for the first and only time, was admirably sung by Mrs. Barry, in a sustained, pure, noble style, easy and melodious, with finely graduated light and shade. A better instance of the genuine Cantabile, alike in composition and interpretation, we have not had for some time. The frolic little song by Franz just tipped the whole with sunny brightness, and proved so fascinating that the singer was obliged to repeat it. Mr. LEONHARD played the accompaniments with his usual sure instinct.—The very large assembly appeared thoroughly contented with their short two hours of carefully selected music.

Of this week's concert, closing the series of ten with the third of the Beethoven programmes, and of the impression made by the remarkable piano-playing of Miss MARY KERN in the great E-flat Concerto of Beethoven, and the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue of Bach, we shall speak in our next.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY.—An interesting Soirée (at least to those who did not fairly wilt and wither and collapse under the excessive heat of the unventilated room) was given by some of the teachers of this institution, last Monday evening, at the lower hall (ridiculously called Meisonson) of the Tremont

Temple. The programme, which was to be performed, read thus:

Introduction and Rondo for Violin and Piano, B minor.
F. Schubert.
Messrs. Julius Eichberg and Hugo Leonhard.
Adelaide.....Beethoven.
Prof. C. Glogner-Castelli.
La Pavanne [French dance of the XVIII. Century]
J. Eichberg.
Song.....Abt.
Prof. C. Glogner-Castelli.
Trio in C minor for Violin, Violoncello, and Piano.
Glogner-Castelli.
Allegro assai. Andante con moto.
Allergo con spirito.
Messrs. Eichberg, A. Suck, and Glogner-Castelli.

But unfortunately, owing to a severe cold with which the late Professor of singing at the Leipzig Conservatorium, Herr CARL GLOGNER-CASTELLI, was afflicted, the crowd, who came mainly with the hope of hearing so artistic a singer, were disappointed by the omission of the vocal pieces. In their place were substituted two movements (Allegro and Adagio) from the Sonata Duo of Beethoven, Op. 30, in A, for piano and violin, finely played by Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG. These came directly after the beautiful Introduction and Rondo by Schubert, which of course every one enjoyed. So did every one (of any Salamander power of endurance, as above hinted) enjoy the quaint old French dance, played in the true humor of the thing by Mr. EICHBERG.

Now the privation in regard to hearing Prof. Castelli sing, and personally illustrate the art which he is so well qualified to teach, and which he formally makes his profession, was in a great degree made up for, to the agreeable surprise of most, by that gentleman's Trio for piano, violin and 'cello. Thrown in rather en amateur, as it were, it at once proved his excellent musicianship, both as composer and pianist. The work was musical, to say the least, having an internal right to be, and not springing merely from that vague ambition which leads so many to attempt all sorts of things. But more than that, this Trio is a genial production; the themes are beautiful, and the working up both logical and full of interest, particularly in the first two movements. The finale, too, is clever, a little odd, but on the whole less interesting. It is a rarity indeed to find so much of a musician in one whose speciality is the voice.

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY. The 145th Concert was given in the pleasant little Wesleyan Association Hall, in Bromfield Street, on Wednesday, March 15, with the following programme:

Festspiel und Brantied, from Wagner's Lohengrin, arranged by.....Max Bruch.
Song, The Charming.....Mendelssohn.
Violin Solo, Elegie.....Ernst.
Song, Bei Raggio.....Rossini.
Ballade.....Reinecke.

The pianist of the occasion was Mr. H. G. TUCKER (an accomplished pupil of Mr. Lang); the Violin Solo was played by Mr. F. H. TORRINGTON; the Songs were by Miss INGRAHAM.

CÆCILIE-VERREIN.—This well trained Club of amateur singers (mixed voices), under the direction of Mr. KREISSMANN, made a very pleasant evening for their friends, on Thursday, March 2, at Brackett's Hall. The programme was too choice to go unrecorded.

Chorus, Ave Maria.....A. Billeter.
Quartet, "Tuba mirum" [Requiem].....W. A. Mozart.
Song, "Lord, at all times I will bless thee".....Mendelssohn.
Chorus, Ave verum.....W. A. Mozart.
Arie, "O God have mercy," St. Paul.....Mendelssohn.
Chorus, Offertorium.....M. Hauptmann.
Arie, "Que moribundus," Stabat Mater.....Pergolesi.
Chorus, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt".....Beethoven.

Ballade, "Schoen Ellen," Soprano and Baritone Solo and Chorus.....Max Bruch.
Song, Hugonotta.....Meyerbeer.
Quartet, "Spring Song".....R. Franz.
Song, "Er der Herrliche".....R. Schumann.
Duet, "Leizter Gruess".....Graben-Hoffmann.
Duet, { a. "Fruehlingsschmerz" } Gade.
          b. "Heldenrosslein" }
Four Part Song, { a. "Das Ruhethal" } Mendelssohn.
                  b. "Der erste Fruehlingstag" }
                  c. "Abschied vom Walde" }

The last of Mr. JAMES M. WEHLI's Three Popular Concerts (Saturday afternoon, March 11), was chiefly noticeable for the excellent Quartet singing of Mrs. SMITH, Mrs. BARRY, Mr. PACKARD and Mr. M. W. WHITNEY. They sang two Quartets: "Bella Figlia," from Rigoletto, perhaps the best piece Verdi ever wrote, and "Il Carnivale" by Rossini, which should be better known. The solos and duets severally found favor. Mr. WEHLI played his "Martha" Fantasia, his left-handed "Sweet Home" variations, and something else a good deal better for an encore.

WHAT NEXT? First in order of the good things promised us is the first of Three "Recitals" of Piano Music by Miss MARIE KREBS, to be given in Brackett's Hall, next Tuesday afternoon, March 28, at three o'clock. Those who have heard the young Saxon lady play in the Symphony Concert this week, will need no persuasion to attend these Recitals. Miss Krebs will be assisted by her mother, Mme. KREBS-MICHALES, one of the most distinguished leading singers of the Royal Opera at Dresden, who will sing Schubert's "Wanderer," Schumann's "Waldesgespräch," and a song composed by her husband, Kapellmeister Krebs, of Dresden. The daughter will play Beethoven's Sonata: "Les Adieux, l' Absence, et la Retour;" a Nocturne by Chopin, and Novelette, No. 4, by Schumann; Prelude and Fugue (à la Tarantelle), in A minor, by Bach; and the Rigoletto Fantasia by Liszt.

Wednesday Eve, 29th. Mr. HERMANN DAUM, being about to remove to New York, gives a Farewell Concert in the Music Hall, with the friendly coöperation of many Boston artists. Messrs. LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER will play the Bach Concerto, in C, for three pianos. Mrs. WEST, Miss RYAN and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN will sing. Mr. DAUM himself will play one of the early Sonatas of Beethoven, and a Polonaise by Chopin. The whole programme will be choice, and the occasion will enlist a great deal of sympathy.

Thursday, 30th, at 3:12 P.M. CARL ZERRAHN'S Annual Benefit Concert naturally follows close upon the last of the Harvard Symphony Concerts, and with the aid of the Grand Orchestra which he has trained so conscientiously and carefully, and to a point of excellence never before reached by any Boston Orchestra. The programme is very inviting: Beethoven's 4th Symphony; Schumann Concerto, by Miss MARIE KREBS; Adagio, &c. from Beethoven's "Prometheus;" Polonaise in A flat, Chopin (Miss KREBS); Serenade for five 'Cellos, Double-Bass, &c., by Schwenke; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark.

April 1st and 2nd (Saturday and Sunday Evenings) are the dates fixed for the NIELSEN Oratorio performances ("Creation and "Messiah") with the Handel and Haydn Society.

VIOLIN QUARTET MATINEES. The four Matinees by the LISTEMANN QUARTET party (the first Concerts of this kind which Boston has had this winter!) will be given at Wesleyan Hall on the four Wednesday Afternoons of April, beginning April 5th, at 3½ o'clock.

Each programme will contain two Quartets; a Violin Solo Sonata by one of the old masters (Biber, Corelli, Tartini, etc.), played by Mr. B. Listemann; and either some choice vocal solos, or a Trio for piano, violin and 'cello. The Quartets selected are the following:

Cherubini in E flat. Mozart in E flat.
Schubert in D minor. Raff in A major.

Haydn in G major. Sveden in A minor, op. 1 [new].
Beethoven in E flat op. 127. Beethoven in F [Rasoumoffski].

Subscription for the whole Series, $4 00. Single Admission $1.50. Subscriptions received at the Music Stores, or at the Bookstores of Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., and J. R. Osgood & Co.

Mr. A. P. PECK offers remarkable attractions for his Annual Concert, April 12.

Mr. RICHARD HOFFMAN's Concerts, in Chickering's new hall, New York, must have been among the very choicest musical occasions of the year. The programmes were as follows:

January 14.

Trio, Op. 11.....Beethoven.
Messrs. J. Burke, F. Bergner, and Hoffman.
Sonata in G, op. 14, No. 2.....Beethoven.
Mr. Hoffman.

Nocturne, Op. 83, No 1. }
Polonaise, Op. 63. }.....Chopin.

Sonata, [Cello and Piano], Op. 45.....Mendelssohn.
Pensées Fugitives. [Violin and Piano]. Heller and Ernst.
"Murmures Hollandeses".....Gottschalk.

February 18.

Trio, in D minor, Op. 49.....Mendelssohn.
Sonata, A flat, Op. 23.....Beethoven.
Solo for Violoncello.....Gottschalk.

Fantasia on "La Sonnambula".....Thalberg.
Andantino and Tarantella, op. 178. [Violin and Piano.]
Reinsiger.

"Solitude" and Improvisation on "Robin Adair," R. Hoffman.

March 18.

Trio, Op. 18.....C. Eckert.
Songs, { "Ein Friedhof".....R. Franz.
          "Der Nussbaum".....Schumann.
Miss Antoinette Sterling.

"Kreutzer" Sonata.....Beethoven.

{ Suite: "Harmonious Blacksmith".....Handel.
          Tarantelle, Op. 85, No. 2.....S. Heller.

Old English Ballad [1550]: "The Three Ravens."
"Memory," and "Caprice de Concert" on Themes from "Dinorah".....Hoffman.

We know Mr. Hoffman of old, and treasure up delightful memories of musical evenings with him and Joseph Burke, Wm. Scharfenberg, and other kindred spirits, in the days when we used to visit New York; and we can fully believe every word in the following notice of the last concert in the Sun:

These concerts have been attended by those who have the interests of music in its best phases most at heart. Many of the audience have been pupils of this master, who have received in this public way the finished illustrations of the maxims and instruction that have been received in private. One distinguishing feature of the concerts has been the modesty of the giver of them, a quality that ever lends the highest grace to art. Most pianists make their concerts the occasion for a certain self glorification, by filling their programme with their own compositions, and ignoring those of other composers.

But Mr. Hoffman has given the place of honor to the compositions of others, and by his admirable interpretation of the works of Beethoven and others of the great masters has added to his already brilliant reputation. In this good work he has received the valuable assistance of Mr. Joseph Burke, a violinist in sympathy with whatever is noblest in his art. It is cause for regret that this artist should be heard so very seldom in public. His tone is firmer, his playing broader, his expression truer than those of most of the foreign violinists who appear in our concert rooms. Perhaps it is simply because Mr. Burke will not lend himself to the "tricks that are vain," which are needed to beguile the public into appreciation, that he so seldom comes before it.

These concerts have been so healthy in their tone, so interesting, and so instructive that we can but hope that another winter will bring a renewal of them.

NEW YORK, MARCH 13.—The fourth concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place at the Academy of Music, on Saturday evening. These were the orchestral selections:

Symphony, No. 12, in B flat.....Haydn.
Overture, "Faust".....Wagner.
Overture, "A calm and happy voyage".....Mendelssohn.

Though the orchestra is not as large as the New York Philharmonic, it is perhaps composed of equal talent, as nearly every one in it belongs to the New York one. It numbers 60 performers, and is under the direction of Herr Carl Bergmann.

The orchestral pieces were very well performed. Miss Kellogg sang the same selections which she sang at the New York Philharmonic Concert a week ago, and her reception was much better. She responded to the second encore with a familiar little song: "The light is fading from the sky."

The programme also contained a chorus of forty male voices under the direction of Mr. Joseph Mosenthal. The audience was very large and very orderly.

Miss Krebs gave the ninth of her Piano Matinées yesterday. She played the "Sonata Appassionata" of Beethoven, and several pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, &c. The audience completely filled the small hall.

MARCH 20.—On Tuesday Mlle. Nilsson returned to New York and sang in a concert. On Wednesday she sang in the oratorio "Creation," the "Mendelssohn Union," under the direction of Mr. Geo. F. Bristow, giving the choruses; and also in a "Grand Nilsson Matinée" on Saturday. Her selections on Tuesday were the scena and aria, "Ah! Perfido" of Beethoven, and Handel's song, "Let the bright seraphim." They were both sung in a splendid manner, though I think that Mme. Parepa Rosa has sung them better in the same hall in Sunday concerts. Miss Nilsson was ably assisted by M. Henri Vieuxtemps (who played his own "Fantasie Appassionata") Miss Cary, Signor Verger, and an orchestra under Max Maretzek. There will be two more Nilsson concerts next week.

On Saturday there were no less than five concerts, viz.: a matinee at Association Hall by the "Euterpe"; Grand Nilsson Matinée at Steinway Hall; Miss Krebs's tenth piano matinee; a concert by Mr. Richard Hoffman at Chickering's Rooms; and the U. C. Hill testimonial concert at the Academy of Music. I shall only notice the last of these. The following are the principal numbers of the programme:

Overture, "Fermont".....Beethoven.
Quartet, Op. 33.....Geo. Onslow.
Seventy Strings.
Concerto, E minor.....Chopin.
Mr. S. H. Mills.
1st movement from unfinished Symphony.....Schubert.
Serenade, four violoncellos.....Lachner.
F. Bergner, C. Bergman, A. Hoch, A. Leisegang.
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber.

The orchestra was of colossal proportions, and included the members of the Philharmonic and Aschenbrodel Societies. The playing of the lovely movement from Schubert's unfinished symphony was the best of the orchestral numbers.

Miss Kellogg was set down for Rossini's "Bel Raggio," but, not being in very good voice, substituted a simpler song for it. She was recalled at each time but refused to sing. It is needless to praise Mr. Mill's playing. There was also a violin performance by Master Willie Hess (who is only eleven years old) who gives promise of becoming a great artist at some future day. J. M. W.

FARMINGTON, CONN., MARCH 15.—The following are the programmes of the 49th and 50th Concerts of Chamber-music, given at Miss S. Porter's Young Ladies' School, under the direction of Mr. K. Klausner. The executants were Miss Mary Krebs, Mme. Krebs-Michalesi, and Mr. W. Kopta.

49th Concert: Andante con Variazioni and Presto from the Kreutzer-Sonata, op. 47, Beethoven; "The Wanderer," Schubert; Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Bach; Romanza, op. 50, for Violin, Beethoven; "Waldeggespräch," Schumann; Toccata, op. 7, Schumann; "Mein Hochland," Krebs; Nocturne in G, op. 37, No. 2, Chopin; Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 4, Liszt; Andante and Allegro molto vivace from the Violin Concerto, op. 64, Mendelssohn.

50th Concert: Sonata in F minor, op. 57, Beethoven; "Der Neugierige" and "Die Post," Schubert; La Trille du diable, Tartini; Barcarole and Waltz, Rubinstein; "Er der Herrlichste" Schumann; Air et Gavotte, Vieuxtemps; Novallette in D, op. 21, No. 2, Schumann; "Valencia's Rose," Krebs; Polonaise in A flat, op. 53, Chopin.

Mozart and "The Messiah."

The Tribune of the 7th inst. brings me some extraordinary musical history, in the passages here cited:

"Dr. James Pech defends his conduct, in turning the Messiah upside down and tampering with the score of Haydn's Imperial Mass, by the examples of Mozart and Mendelssohn, who supplied or elaborated the instrumental accompaniments for several of Handel's Oratorios and Cantatas. Without admitting that Mozart and Mendelssohn are a rule for Dr. Pech, we must remind that gentleman that the work he has undertaken is not at all like theirs. Handel's scores were never published in full, and the copies used when the Oratorios were performed under Handel's own direction were destroyed at the burning of Covent Garden Theatre in 1808. Mozart's instrumentation was not an attempt to improve or in any way change the scores, but to fill out the imperfect published sketches and restore the works as nearly as possible to their original form. A subsequent discovery of Handel's MSS. has shown that Mozart caught the composer's spirit admirably, and reproduced the original forms much more closely than any one would have thought possible. This necessary restoration is of course essentially different from the arbitrary changes by which the Harmonic Society has undertaken to show us how Handel would have constructed his great work if he had taken Dr. Pech's advice," &c., &c.

Because this appeared in the New York Tribune, which has earned the right to speak with authority on most topics, I deem a note or two necessary and proper. I agree fully with the writer as to the point at issue with Dr. Pech; but regret the style and matter of his argument.

If the Tribune critic should visit Cambridge, he should see in the College library the score of the Messiah "published in full" with this title: "Messiah, an Oratorio in Score, as it was originally performed. Composed by Mr. Handel; to which are added his additional alterations. London: Printed by Messrs. Randall & Abell, successors to the late Mr. J. Walsh in Catherine Street in the Strand, of whom may be had the completed scores of Samson, Alexander's Feast, and Acis and Galatea."

As the book was a present to the Library from Hollis, who died 1774, it was of course published before the burning of Covent Garden Theatre in 1808.

Acis and Galatea was published still earlier. My own copy of the original edition has this title: "Acis and Galatea, a Mask, as it was originally composed, with the Overture, Recitations, Songs, Duets and Choruses, for voices and instruments. Set to music by Mr. Handel. London: Printed by W. Randall, successor to the late Mr. Walsh in Catherine Street, Strand."

Mozart's instrumentation was not an attempt to "fill out imperfect published sketches and restore" works to their original form; but in part (small part) to enrich the orchestration, though mainly to supply the place of an organ, as the performances of Van Swieten's Society took place either in his house, the great hall of the Imperial Library, or in a palace of one of the music loving nobility.

In the "Acis and Galatea," the "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," and the "Alexander's Feast" there was hardly a change in the string instrument parts; none in fact except in a few passages, where Handel had written only one violin, and where Mozart adds the second violin and viola to fill out the harmony. Handel did not use clarinets and trombones, because they were not in use in his day. Mozart of course employed all the resources of the orchestra in supplying the place of the organ.

The Messiah was too long for one of the Van Swieten performances. Mozart shortened it, and in his changes went, as Jahn himself admits, too far. I think it would interest the readers of the Journal to see a translation of Jahn on this subject, (see the 4th vol. of his "Mozart," pp. 456, et seq.)

As to Mendelssohn, what did he ever do with Handel's work, except make a very bad organ accompaniment to the Israel in Egypt?

Trieste, Jan. 25, 1871.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Pilgrims of the Night. 3. G to e. F. Clare. 30
A sacred song of uncommonly easy and graceful melody

"Hark! Hark, my soul,
Angelic songs are swelling
O'er earth's green fields
And o'er sea's wave-beat shore"

Bo-Peep! Spring song. 3. A to e. O. Hennel. 30
A sweet concert of Spring and Spring flowers, prettily set to music.

Flynn of Virginia. 3. F to e. F. B. 40
Poem by Bret Harte. Very effective, if properly sung and claimed.

"Back to the wall,
He held the timbers ready to fall,
Then in the darkness I heard him call:
'Run for your life, Jack! Run for your wife's sake!'"

Meet me Addie, by the Oak Tree. 3. G to d. F. Christie. 40
Fine lithograph title. One of the "Meet me in the Lane" kind of songs, and very pleasing. Good choros.

Only Hope! Song and Chorus. 3. B to f. Tucker. 30
Cheerful, bright little song, with wide-awake choros.

The Lord is in His holy Temple. Quartet. 4. E to e. Otto Lob. 40
Fine new Quartet for choir use.

Ah! do not forget. Song and Chorus. 3. A to f. H. Tucker. 35
Fine melody.

"Ah, do not forget, tho' the mem'ry be sadness,
That first happy hour, when strangers, we met."

I really don't think I shall marry. Comic. 2. G to f. Gabrielle. 30 Light, tripping, and amusing.

Dat's der kind of Mans I am. 3. B to f. W. F. Wallman. 30
Hans Breitman style of poetry, and very funny.

Easter Hymn. Morning breaks upon the Tomb. 4. C to f. W. H. Clarke. 50
One of the very best. For quartette or choros, with solo, and a finely elaborated obbligato Organ accompaniment, with stops and expression carefully marked.

Daughters of Freedom, the Ballot be Yours. Solo and Quartet. 3. B to f. F. Christie. 30
Now rally round the ballot box, ladies! Here's a war song of the Amazons!

Instrumental.

Floral Polka Mazurka. 3. A to e. C. de Janon. 30
Varied time, with octaves, trills and grace notes in plenty. Very pleasing.

Brandenburg March. 3. C. B. G. Jarnis. 30
Very good march, with considerable variety, and of a style approaching that of the Wedding March, but much easier.

Overture to the "Light Cavalry." 4 hands. A. 4. F. v. Suppe. 1.00
Brings in the bugle flourishes appropriate to light cavalry evolutions, and is very spirited and entertaining.

Thunder and Lightning. (Unter Donner und Blitz). Fast Polka. 4. G. J. Strauss. 40
Furious, noisy and entertaining.

Woman's Heart. Frauenherz Polka Mazurka. 3. F. J. Strauss. 35
One would hardly recognize it as Strauss' music, so full of expression, and so different from his usual style is it. A fine piece.

Paraphrase on "The Girl I left behind me." 3. G. J. H. Wood. 40
Favorite melody, varied.

Joys Departed. Nocturne. 3. F. J. W. Turner. 30
Pleasing melody, and good instructive piece.
